While the CCC butter inventories were climbing, the balance in CCC purchases made a huge shift toward butter and away from nonfat dry milk. In the first quarter of fiscal year 1987 CCC purchased 52 million pounds of butter and 97 million pounds of nonfat dry milk. In the first quarter of fiscal year 1988, however, CCC purchased 44 million pounds of butter, but no nonfat dry milk.

Purchases of butter have remained so high that if the present trend continues butter purchases could lead to a reduction in the milk price support level on January 1, 1990. This bill will reduce these high levels of CCC butter purchases.

The bill is also important because it sends a signal to our dairy industry that the milk price support system will provide less of a reward for butterfat. With changes in dietary patterns, market signals would indicate decreased demand for milk with high butterfat content. Of course, our milk producers cannot change what their cows produce overnight. This is a good bill because it involves a modest shift to bring the Government's milk price support policy closer to these market signals, thus encouraging the production of milk with lower butterfat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 553) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 553

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PURCHASE PRICE FOR NON-FAT DRY MILK AND BUTTER.

(a) MODIFICATION OF PURCHASE PRICE FOR NON-FAT DRY MILK AND BUTTER.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, with respect to purchases of butter and non-fat dry milk made under section 201(d) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1446(d)), the Secretary of Agriculture, in carrying out the temporary $0.50 per hundred-weight increase in the rate of price support for milk provided for in section 102(b) of the Disaster Assistance Act of 1988 (7 U.S.C. 1446 note), shall provide that at least 75 percent of such price support increase shall be reflected in the purchase price for non-fat dry milk and that not more than 25 percent of such price support increase shall be reflected in the purchase price for butter.

(b) DECREASE IN PURCHASE PRICE FOR NON-FAT DRY MILK AND BUTTER.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, with respect to purchases of butter and non-fat dry milk made under section 201(d) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1446(d)), the Secretary of Agriculture, in implementing the $0.50 per hundredweight decrease in the rate of price support for milk scheduled to occur on July 1, 1989, (as provided in section 102(b) of the Disaster Assistance Act of 1988 (7 U.S.C. 1446 note)), shall provide that not more than 25 percent of such price support decrease shall be reflected in the purchase price for non-fat dry milk and that at least 75 percent of such price support decrease shall be reflected in the purchase price for butter.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE TOWER VOTE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, earlier this evening I talked to the President. I know the distinguished majority leader called the President along with the chairman. I appreciate that and he appreciated that very much.

The President, you know, said he wanted to win, obviously. He thought he had a good man. We did not have enough votes. He accepts that.

We have a lot of work to do in the next several months. There may be a few temporary scars around for a while but I think he is right. I think we have to get on with it. We have a lot of work to do.

Maybe we will start, I guess when we are back after the recess, with the minimum wage and from then on I assume it is going to be pretty much full speed ahead, a full schedule.

I thank the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank my friend, the distinguished Republican leader. I did call the President shortly after the vote. Senator NUNN was with me. And I expressed to the President my hope that he and I had both previously stated, that we can work together to deal with the serious problems the country faces in a positive and cooperative spirit. The President was his usual gracious self; expressed appreciation for the call. I look forward to seeing him soon and continuing our discussions with him on a wide range of issues.

I also again thank my friend and colleague, the distinguished Republican leader. This was a new experience for me. It was not one I sought. It was difficult for all concerned and I am very grateful to the distinguished Republican leader for the courtesy, thoughtfulness, and graciousness which he has accorded me during this very difficult period for all concerned.

ORDERS FOR MONDAY

RECESS UNTIL MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1989

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 12 noon, Monday, March 13; and that on Monday the Senate be in pro forma session only with no business conducted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS ON MONDAY UNTIL 10 A.M., WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that on Monday, March 13, at the close of the pro forma session, the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m. on Wednesday, March 15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, after the time for the two leaders, there be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 11 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is my hope that at 11 a.m. on Wednesday, March 15, we will be able to take up S. 20, the whistleblower protection bill under a short-time agreement.

ORDER FOR RECESS FROM 12:15 P.M. TO 2 P.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday, March 15, the Senate stand in recess from 12:15 p.m. to 2 p.m. in order to accommodate the party conference luncheons.

RECESS UNTIL MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1989

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if the Republican leader has no further business and if no other Senator is seeking recognition, then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 noon on Monday as under the previous order.

The motion was agreed to and, at 6:16 p.m., the Senate recessed until Monday, March 13, 1989, at noon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SECRETARY BAKER'S VIENNA SPEECH

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert in the RECORD the text of the speech delivered by Secretary of State James A. Baker yesterday in Vienna.

Secretary Baker's speech offers a clear guideline for United States foreign policy toward arms control in Europe and United States relations with the Soviet Union. One particularly important element in this speech is Secretary Baker's comments regarding chemical weapons.

I was very impressed and pleased by his comprehensive statement regarding U.S. chemical weapons policy. The question of chemical weapons proliferation is emphasized as a global, multilateral problem which all the Western democracies must address resolutely and in a concerted manner. I couldn't agree more.

This speech deserves the attention of my colleagues. It is an important initial marker for the new administration in the area of foreign policy. I would highly recommend that my colleagues read this speech.

NEW HORIZONS IN EUROPE

(Address by Hon. James A. Baker III, Secretary of State)

Foreign Ministers, ladies and gentlemen, we meet here today in an historic setting. Vienna is a living monument to the creativity of Western culture. This city is also a crossroads of civilization. It reminds us that Europe and the achievements of Europe have always gone beyond the limits of geography to influence the wider world.

But Vienna also bears witness to vanished hopes. Negotiations and agreements intended to bring enduring peace to Europe have been discarded too often in war. Too often the lack of security in Europe has meant a lack of security for the world. That is why we are meeting here to negotiate. Our purpose is to improve the security of Europe, thereby also strengthening the foundations of world peace.

I believe that we need a larger perspective, a common vision of where we are headed and why, in order to succeed.

After the Second World War, Europe and the world were confronted by two opposing views. The United States and its allies in Western Europe held the vision of free peoples, living under the rule of law, their individual freedoms protected, their democratic governments responsible to the people.

We believed, as we continue to believe, that freedom of speech and of religion, freedom from fear and freedom of opportunity, were and are the natural rights of free men everywhere. We were certain, and we continue to be certain, that free markets and individual initiatives are the surest routes to social and economic progress. We sought, and we continue to seek, our security in a coalition of free nations, drawn together by common values, not only mutual interests. And we envisioned then as we envision now, a Europe at peace, its nations free to develop in diversity but united against war.

Our vision was not the only vision. There was another view, opposed to the values most cherished by the West. And the competition between the two visions gave us the difficult legacy with which we live today. A Europe, forcibly divided against the will of its peoples. A Europe, the most heavily armed continent in the world.

Now, as we approach the end of this decade new horizons are beckoning, horizons that offer us the opportunity to go beyond the conflicts of the past. The other vision is changing. It is changing because we in the West have been faithful to our own vision. And it is changing because realism has begun to triumph in the Soviet Union.

Perestroika, glasnost, democratization are the slogans of the "New thinking." There are encouraging developments in human rights, in the emphasis on the rule of law. Economics once rigidly fixed in the grip of centralized control are being loosened and a role for individual initiative has been decreed. Recently, General Secretary Gorbachev has declared, "world politics, too, should be guided by the primacy of universal human values." The rhetoric of Soviet foreign policy is being reshaped with less emphasis on the use of force.

No one can foretell where this process will lead or even whether it will endure. Yet we cannot deny the reality of what is actually happening in Europe today. Dostoevsky, in his novel, "The Possessed," wrote, that "The fire is in the minds of men, not in the roofs of buildings." The revolutionary changes in that part of Europe still freedom of the mind, freedom in the home, they're all in the minds of free governments. And these freedoms will heal the wounds inflicted by stagnation and tyranny.

I propose that we dedicate ourselves to creating a new Europe, based on these freedoms:

The freedom of all Europeans to have a say in decisions which affect their lives, including freedom of the workplace. The legality of Solidarity, for example, should be the norm not the subject of negotiations.

The freedom of all Europeans to express their political differences, when all ideas are welcome and human rights are truly inviolable. Monitors of the Helsinki agreements, for example, should be honored not hunted by their governments.

The freedom of all Europeans to exchange ideas, and information and to exercise freedom of movement. The researcher in Prague, for example, should be able to find the books he needs. Barbed wire should not separate cousins in Hamburg from cousins in Dresden. And a wall should not divide Berlin, continuing, as we've seen in the past month, to cost the lives of people seeking freedom.

Finally, the freedom of all Europeans to be safe from military intimidation or attack. Those in the West should be free of the fear that the massive forces under Soviet command might invade them. Those in the East should be free of the fear that armed Soviet intervention, justified by the Brezhnev Doctrine, would be used again to deny them choice.

"New thinking" and the Brezhnev Doctrine are in fundamental conflict.

We call today upon General Secretary Gorbachev to renounce the Brezhnev Doctrine—beyond any shadow of a doubt. Let the "new thinking" sweep away this vestige from the era of stagnation.

These four freedoms are inseparable. They are the principles for the new Europe, they are the keys that open the door to the European house of the future. As the American President Abraham Lincoln said, "a house divided against itself cannot stand." A continent divided by a wall cannot be secure. A secure and prosperous Europe can never be built on the basis of artificial barriers, fear and the denial of independence.

I am happy to report that we have made some progress toward realizing the new Europe of the Freedoms—progress upon which we can build. The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, through the Helsinki, Madrid, Stockholm and now the Vienna documents, has defined ever more precisely the obligations of states. We have emphasized a new freedom for individuals, and the expanded concept of openness and confidence building measures in the field of security. We support this process. The Helsinki Final Act embodies our vision of Europe. And NATO's security dimension has always had the prevention of war as its only purpose.

Economic change is also a marked feature of the new Europe. The creation of a single market by 1992, looking outward to benefit all who wish to trade, would surely fulfill the hopes of those postwar visionaries who rightfully saw economic union as a buttress of peace and freedom. Centralized economies are slowly divesting the straightjacket of outmoded Marxist-Leninist theories. And the desire for increased commercial contact is strong and growing stronger.

There also is a genuine possibility for all industrialized nations, both east and west, to work together on newly recognized transnational problems. Dangers to our environment, for example, risk the most fundamental security of all the earth's citizens. Just last week, to protect the globe's ozone layer, the European Community and the United States decided to end the use of all chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) by the year 2000, assuming adequate substitutes can be found as we believe they can. We hope the Soviet Union will consider joining us, in the spirit of "new thinking."

This is progress. But while the old era apparently recedes before the horizons of the new Europe, those horizons are still too distant. The arms and the armies still face each other. An Iron Curtain still divides the Continent. Too many governments have followed their solemn signature on human rights pledges with violent suppression of dissent.

And so, as we eye the horizon, important questions remain unanswered. Will the new rhetoric be translated into new actions or will we see a repetition of the past, of hopes disappointed once more?

Will East and West together be able to dismantle the barriers thrown up by the old era of competing visions? Will these barriers finally be removed, will the Berlin Wall and the barbed wire and the watch towers finally be relegated to history?

Will the Soviet Union demilitarize its foreign policy in Europe, will it cease to threaten democracy's house with tens of thousands of tanks?

In recent years, we have seen reason to be hopeful about the new Soviet thinking. But, both realism and prudence require that we test the new thinking to make sure that it means new policy and above all, changes in military deployments. We have sought to discover whether East and West could take steps together—irreversible steps—that lead toward the Europe of the Freedoms. And we have also sought to reduce the level of military confrontation.

Here, too, there is progress to report. Responding to an American proposal, the Soviet Union joined the United States in achieving an Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty that provides for the elimination of an entire class of nuclear-capable missiles. The Treaty contains important precedents, especially in the areas of verification and asymmetrical reductions to equality. We have also made encouraging progress in the START Talks toward reducing strategic forces. And we look forward, once our review is completed, to further steps on the road toward arms reductions and arms control.

President Bush has declared that the control and elimination of chemical weapons is a high priority. Since 1984, when he tabled a draft treaty to eliminate chemical weapons from the face of the earth on an effectively verifiable basis, the United States has exercised leadership in the Geneva negotiations in the CD. We will continue to be at the forefront of these efforts in the future as well. However, until we eliminate these weapons in a verifiable way, the United States will maintain a minimal chemical deterrent.

Recently, we were gratified by the response to President Reagan's call for a conference on the use of chemical weapons—and the success of that conference under the leadership of the Government of France. Clearly, some nations are ready for action.

The United States is prepared to lead in dealing with this problem.

And so I am happy to announce that as one of his first acts, President Bush has directed our new Administration to explore ways to accelerate the removal of our existing chemical weapons from Germany. The early removal of these weapons will require available safe storage and the development of practical plans to destroy them.

Unilateral action is not enough. The Soviet Union has enormous stocks of chemical weapons threatening Europe. We therefore call on the Soviets to join us, to accelerate the destruction of their enormous stockpile of these frightening weapons.

Finally, we must address the threat of chemical weapons proliferation.

We can build on our recent success in Paris.

We propose we bring together governments and representatives of the international chemical industry. We have been discussing with Australia the general question of proliferation and the importance of holding such a conference. For a number of years, Australia has played a leading role internationally in trying to prevent the spread of chemical weapons, including as leader of the Australia Group of Western chemical producing states. I am pleased to tell you, therefore, that the Government of Australia, has agreed to take the initiative in organizing such a conference.

Its purpose will be to discuss the growing problem of the movement of chemical weapons precursors and technology in international commerce. We hope to establish better means of communication about this deadly trade.

Progress on nuclear arms control and chemical weapons, however, is not sufficient. We shall never be able to set East-West relations on an irreversible course toward enduring improvement unless we deal with the huge conventional military imbalances in Europe. We can define the issue simply. A vast force, spearheaded by heavily armored units and supported by massive firepower, has been fielded by the Soviet Union and its allies. It points West.

We in the West have faced this threat since the dawn of the Cold War. Today, Soviet and Warsaw Pact military forces go far beyond those conceivably needed for defense. Warsaw Pact tanks outnumber NATO tanks by over 3 to 1. Warsaw Pact artillery exceeds NATO's artillery by 3 to 1. And the Warsaw Pact holds more than a 2 to 1 advantage over NATO's armored troop carriers.

These ratios speak for themselves. And as NATO has pointed out, these are the forces best suited to an invasion of Western Europe.

It is this array of Soviet armed might that divides Europe against its will and holds European hopes hostage to possibly hostile Soviet intentions.

Lately, we have heard that Soviet military doctrine is changing to meet a standard that they call "reasonable sufficiency." And in December, at the U.N., General Secretary Gorbachev declared the Soviet intention to withdraw 50,000 men, 5,000 tanks and other selected equipment from certain areas of Eastern Europe. Several East European governments have also announced unilateral force reductions.

That's a start, a very good start. It's a very hopeful start and of course we are watching to see the words become deeds. And equally clear is the necessity to go further. Even after these reductions, the Warsaw Pact would retain over a 2 to 1 edge in tanks and artillery. The Warsaw Pact's conventional military preponderance, especially in the spearheads of attack, is what makes an invasion possible.

These are hard facts. These are the facts that have to be changed if our negotiations are to be successful and if the foundations of a new Europe are to endure. The arms control process must now be focused strongly on this East-West imbalance.

The United States, together with the other Western participants in these talks, has developed serious proposals to end disparities in conventional ground forces and to introduce far-reaching confidence building and stabilizing measures.

Our approach focuses on the achievement of significant reductions in key military capabilities that are designed for invasion. For example, we propose an overall limit on the total armament in Europe and that no more than 40,000 tanks should be deployed by the twenty-three participating states in the CFE negotiations. In addition, western participants are prepared to introduce new confidence building measures in the near future, aimed at increasing transparency and reducing the possibility of surprise attack. Ultimately, of course, stability will be achieved when no country is able to dominate by force of arms.

Let me emphasize once more, however, that change in the military balance is only one part of the process. Only when the causes of the historic division of Europe have been removed, when we have achieved the free flow of people and information, when citizens everywhere enjoy free expression, will it be possible to eliminate the military confrontation. In other words, we cannot remove the symptoms, without dealing fundamentally with the causes. I am encouraged that increasingly people from both East and West understand that relationship. We must all work to bring about far-reaching changes that end the division of Europe.

The United States is committed to working with reasonable men and women in all countries to achieve success. We approach the negotiations which will begin a few day from now in these very halls, with a clear goal, solid principles and well-defined objectives.

Our goal in these negotiations, as in all arms control negotiations, will be to prevent war—any war, nuclear or conventional—deter aggression and increase stability at lower levels of armed forces. We shall judge every proposal not simply by the numbers of weapons reduced but by the impact on deterrence and stability.

To achieve this goal, we reaffirm the unity of purposes between the United States and its European allies. We have long recognized, as NATO Secretary General Manfred Woerner said, that "Europe needs America as America needs Europe . . .. Separate, we would become victims of world historical development; together we can determine the course of world history for the better."

Our negotiating objectives are well-defined.

First, as I mentioned earlier, the NATO allies have called for equal ceilings in key items of equipment at levels below current NATO forces. This would be the best step toward a secure Europe at lower levels of arms.

Second, no state should possess capabilities designed primarily for invasion.

Third, a regime of mutual openness and transparency about military matters should be expanded which can foster confidence, clarify intentions, and thereby strengthen stability.

In addition, we hope that all states will adopt doctrines and force structures which faithfully reflect defensive intentions.

As these negotiations unfold, we and our allies will explore every opportunity for progress. The current force levels and force structures in Europe are not engraved in stone. They are the product of history, the results of conflict. And they can be changed.

If the past is any guide, however, we can expect many proposals that promise the perfection of disarmament if we would only abandon the pragmatism of deterrence. To paraphrase Winston Churchill, the counsel of perfection is admirable in a clergyman but impractical in a statesman. The opportunities are too precious to be squandered in sweeping but impractical proposals. Instead, let us do the work of peace carefully, progressing step by step and verifying each step.

Ladies and Gentlemen, I have spoken today of the new Europe of the Freedoms, of the new horizons beckoning to a continent divided forty years ago because of a conflict of visions. As that conflict weakens, it may be possible to remove the old obstacles thrown up in Europe's path. That is our task. We must remove at last the conventional force imbalances and curtains of secrecy that have so long imperiled European security and with it, world peace.

This essential step will not be easy. It will produce new challenges, and perhaps difficult moments. But we cannot desist from the task.

I have argued that a clearer understanding of the Europe of the future will ease the burden. Already, we can glimpse part of that horizon of a peaceful and prosperous Europe for which so many have sacrificed. Yet though it beckons, we know that nothing can be taken for granted. It falls to us to take the next step, if not the final one, on the journey.

Prophecy is God's gift to but a few, yet imagination is the birthright of every human being. We can but dimly see the future through the mists of change yet we can all imagine the world we would like to see. That is the summons of our undertaking.

Let us therefore go forward together to build that Europe we would like to see, a free, open, secure, prosperous and whole Europe, ennobling by example all of mankind.

Thank you.

TRIBUTES TO JOSEPH BONVEGNA AND SOLOMON LISS

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the months preceding the commencement of the 101st Congress Maryland lost two of its most tried and true community servants. It is a loss shared by all in my State. Men with their experience, talent, and willingness to help others only come along once in a lifetime. Their talents and contributions will surely be missed.

The loss is somewhat personal for me, however, because they were both my friends. Members of Congress, it has often been said, have many friends, yet in this case I use the term with true sincerity. Over the years they rewarded me with their support and encouragement time and time again. Mr. Speaker, it is a great honor for me to eulogize them here.

State Senator Joseph Bonvegna was a venerable East Baltimore legislator who was a graduate of the old school of Baltimore politics. A veteran of World War II, Joe was first elected to the Maryland House of Delegates in 1966. His district consisted of neighborhoods which placed great emphasis on family values and ethnic pride. Through hard work and constituent service he became a well-respected legislator with solid support.

Joe was elected to the Maryland State Senate in 1974. He became known as an excellent forecaster of the fate of certain pieces of legislation. Other lawmakers came to ask his opinion on the future of their pet bills. A thumbs-up sign meant the bill would most likely pass; a slicing gesture with his right hand indicated that it would not. "I've never known him to be wrong," explained one of his colleagues.

Joe also led the fight against the establishment of a prison at the old Continental Can Factory in Baltimore—a battle he eventually won. He was also one of the principle sponsors of the legislation that established the immensely successful Maryland State lottery.

What I'll most remember about him, though, is all the hard work he did as director of East Baltimore's "I Am An American Day Parade." The parade has long been a Baltimore tradition, and Joe did his best to make sure it stayed that way. The 50th annual parade was held last September, and Joe had invited me to participate again. I did, of course, and thought that it was the best one ever.

The only thing missing was Joe himself. He was bedridden, suffering from the brain tumor which later killed him. I only wish he had gotten to see the parade that he had put together so wonderfully during the last months of his life. Even though Joe is gone now I am sure that there will be a 51st "I Am An American Day Parade"—a living testament to the memory of a great man.

Solomon Liss, chairman of the Maryland State Critical Areas Commission and a retired judge of the Maryland Circuit Court of Appeals, was the other friend I lost. He collapsed while walking to a legislative hearing in Annapolis on the progress of efforts to protect the Chesapeake Bay shoreline from overdevelopment and was pronounced dead of a heart attack.

Sol was an eloquent and genial man who was known for his outspokenness and unique brand of jurisprudence. "He had a common touch," explained one of his colleagues, "He could reach down and understand a person's predicament and set up guidelines for restoring that person to a productive life." When people who had been arrested for nonviolent public drunkenness were brought before him, Sol required that the individual drop $2 into the poor box before dismissing the charges.

Before serving on the bench Sol was a vocal member of the Baltimore City Council. He was an ardent advocate of civil rights and an avowed foe of discrimination. Some of his views were unpopular at the time, and he received a number of death threats. Sol shrugged them off, stating that he did not care if he were a member of the city council "if a person can't espouse on this floor what he believes in."

Sol was also an ardent environmentalist, and he served his cause well on the State's critical areas commission. He spearheaded efforts to limit development within 1,000 feet of the Chesapeake Bay's shoreline. His success in this area earned him the Chesapeake Bay Foundation's "Conservationist of the Year" Award in 1985.

Sol also loved to dance, sing, act, and tell tales. He quickly earned a reputation as a toastmaster, causing one of his colleagues to describe him as "Maryland's George Jessel." Indeed he had a zest for life that truly touched those around him.

A while back I approached Sol and asked him to serve on my advisory board for the selection of Federal judges. Such a board, I knew, would truly benefit from his experience and wisdom. He agreed, and his knowledge and imput proved to be truly remarkable. Such a man can never be replaced in the hearts of those who knew and loved him.

Mr. Speaker, I have had to bury a lot of friends in the past, so the sense of grief I now feel is something which is not unfamiliar. However, words cannot begin to describe fully the sense of loss I feel. I just wanted to acknowledge the passing of two fine men and community servants. Indeed friends are people who should never be forgotten, for they have helped us all to be the people we now are.

Believe me when I say that I will not forget either Joe or Sol.

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, the question of whether or not to reduce the capital gains rate has become the subject of much debate of late due to its injection into the deficit reduction discussions by the Bush administration. The issue for many is whether such a reduction would realize revenue to the Treasury. The Bush administration estimates show that a reduction in the capital gains rate will, in fact, increase revenues, while the Joint Committee on Taxation has estimated that such a reduction will be a revenue loser. While I am personally convinced that a reduction in the rate will generate revenue for the Treasury, I want to leave that discussion aside for now and address another aspect of the debate.

The knee jerk response by many opponents of this proposal seems to be that it is simply a tax break for the rich. What these people apparently fail to realize is that the end result of a reduction in the capital gains rate is an increase in investment. This investment capital, which is sorely needed in this country as the low United States rate of savings will attest, will stimulate the kind of economic growth that creates jobs. It will create jobs that will benefit those people who are less well off in our society. Those who profess to be champions of people at the lower end of the economic spectrum need to realize that the only way to truly help such people is to give them the opportunity to work. Remaining dependent on government programs is not the answer for the poor of our society, opportunity is. The following editorial from the February 19, 1989, San Francisco Chronicle understands why reducing the capital gains rate is so important, and I recommend it to anyone who is undecided on the capital gains issue.

[From the San Francisco Chronicle, Feb. 19, 1989]

REDUCE THE TAX RATE ON CAPITAL GAINS

When President George Bush presented his budget to a joint session of Congress recently, he made it clear he understood the economic opportunity that lies ahead for the United States. And that he was quite aware, as well, of the challenge that would be mounted to portions of his program.

"We will not have the luxury of taking the easy, spendthrift approach of solving problems," said the new president, still basking in the glow of an extended "honeymoon" period with the opposition party, "because higher spending and higher taxes put economic growth at risk.

"Economic growth provides jobs and hope. Economic growth enables us to pay for social programs. Economic growth enhances the security of the nation. And low tax rates create economic growth."

Here is the heart of the Bush approach: Stimulate the country's fiscal engines in order to make the quality of life in this country better for all. To achieve this, the President wants to reduce the tax rate on capital gains.

This will stimulate the American economy by encouraging people to save and invest more in productive assets and to spend less in consumption of goods. When taxes on capital gains are lowered, people get a better return on their longer-term investments. This causes them to shift more of their discretionary dollars away from current consumption (which provides little benefit to the economy) and into longer-term investments, which do stimulate business expansion.

Such investment creates new jobs, new technology and new plants and equipment. This economic process is a truism. The Democrats understand this. However, for reasons of "appearance," they refuse to espouse it themselves.

The Democrats claim that they are worried about people at the lower end of the economic spectrum, and that a reduction in the capital gains rate will primarily help the rich.

However, it is just these less well-off people who most need the increases in jobs that result from incremental investment in the economy.

Typically, powerful House Democrat Dan Rostenkowski is already balking. If the president presses his capital gains cut, then Rostenkowski may try for a higher tax on upper-bracket earners. Such partisan intransigence displays a lack of honesty about the effect of capital gains taxation.

The Democrats are primarily concerned about appearance rather than reality. They are concerned that those gaining the most direct benefit from a capital gains reduction will be people in the higher-income brakcets. And Democrats do not wish to give the appearance of giving them a boost.

The reason this is dishonest is that while such persons may be gaining direct benefit, the more-important indirect benefits—the jobs and income created—go to the very people the Democrats do want to help: the people on the lower end of the economic spectrum.

We are indebted to Gary M. Galles, an assistant professor of economics at Pepperdine University, for an incisive treatise on the subject.

Professor Galles cites a number of "myths" about the tax and slices them down to size and sanity. There is the myth, for instance, that if lower capital gains tax rates benefit the rich, they must harm the poor.

"In fact," says Professor Galles, "in a voluntary exchange economy the way for a 'capitalist' to get rich or richer is to employ his assets to make others better off (or they would not voluntarily trade).

"Heavily taxing the increased asset values that would result from making others (including the poor) better off is an odd way of helping the poor, in whose name opponents of lower capital gains tax rates ultimately rest their case.

"Lower capital gains tax rates are known to be able to stimulate added savings, investment, productivity and income growth (major societal concerns) and have been shown in the past to increase tax revenues. All the opponents of such a change seem to stimulate is misinformation and misguided envy."

The professor makes other points, which we do not have space to go into here, but in essence his academic phraseology complements the president's blunt eloquence: encouraging investment, increased productivity, savings and entrepreneurship (and, not so incidentally, tax revenue) helps everyone down the line. Cutting capital gains makes for a win-win situation in which everyone benefits.

The president's proposal deserves enactment.

TRIBUTE TO HENRY CLUNE

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take note of the February 9 birthday of Mr. Henry Clune, a prominent reporter and writer since the turn of the century. I am proud that both he and I call Rochester, NY, our home. Henry Clune is now 99 years old, but has a youthful spirit and modesty about his many achievements that belie his many years.

Born in Rochester in 1890, Henry Clune has spent a lifetime observing and taking note of the world around him. Although he had not yet finished high school, he started working as an unpaid cub reporter for the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle in 1910. It was at the Democrat and Chronicle that his creative flair for writing emerged. Henry then took his reporting skills with him as he served his country during World War I, fighting as an infantryman in France and writing for the Stars and Stripes.

After World War I, Henry Clune continued to perfect his craft, writing for the Detroit Free Press and the Rochester Herald. He later returned his skills to the paper that trained him, the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, working as a reporter and columnist.

Following a brief courtship, Henry and Olympic swimmer Charlotte Boyle were married on October 17, 1921, in New York City. Charlotte and Henry have spent 67 happy years together.

Henry's column, Seen and Heard, appeared in the Democrat and Chronicle more than five thousand times in a period that spanned longer than 50 years. His creativity is further witnessed in the 12 books that he has written about his life experiences. His 1947 book, "Main Street Beat," is widely regarded as one of the best ever written about a reporter's lifestyle. In addition, his behind-the-scene stories about Rochesterian George Eastman's quest to learn about the physiognomy of the world provide a revealing inside view of a man who gave the gift of photography to the world. So many of Henry's anecdotes capture the unique spirit and ambience of Rochester, and thus reflect its history and its people.

Henry Clune remains an avid reader and writer despite his official retirement in 1968. Another book of his short stories is expected to be released this spring.

I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the contributions that Henry Clune has made throughout his life and continues to make to the people and city of Rochester, as well as the people of this country. His insight and cheerful manner has warmed the hearts of his readers throughout his illustrious career. I wish my dear friend a very happy birthday and many more to come.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF CHI CHIA LONG

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced legislation to grant Mr. Chi Chia Long permanent residence status in this country. The case for granting Mr. Long this status is very compelling and I submit for the RECORD a letter written by Mr. Long describing his struggle.

The letter follows:

First of all, I would like to express the feelings I have for your country. I admire the people involved in the founding of America and its constitution because they had much foresight and conscience for the rights of the common individual. It's basis is on the morals and principles given to everyone by God, not by individuals. This is why the people of my country dream of coming to America, which in Chinese is translated into "The Beautiful Country". The American people vigorously and tirelessly uphold these values of individual rights, not because they are forced to, but because they believe in them and that it is given to all men by birth.

Originally I served as an interpreter in the 1st Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division back in 1950 in Pu-San, Korea. In the summer of 1951 I was captured by the Chinese communist army. I had been interrogated and tortured all the time during 3 years of isolation. At times they subjected me to starvation. They considered me a spy for the U.S. government and tried to force me to admit it. My role was merely an interpreter and I knew nothing of such matters. After these brutal 3 years, I was on probation for 10 more years, during which time I periodically reported to my probation officer once every 2 weeks.

When I had the chance to contact my family I discovered that my mother had passed away, her spirit being shattered at not knowing whether I was dead or alive. I was both heart-broken and ashamed that my family had to go through all of this and many times I wished for death. The communists had not only taken away my rights but also the people dearest to me.

For thirty years now I have held the hope of someday becoming an American citizen and to perhaps start a new life. Most people my age have lots of mixed memories. They talk of good and bad times in their past. I don't remember too well the few scattered good times of my early past, but the worst ones are too numerous to count and are always a burden on my mind. I am in constant fear of the safety of not only myself, but also for my wife and family. When asked to publicize my predicament, I said no since this might endanger the rest of my family still there. My dream is to live the rest of my life in peace. Perhaps of having rights like any other individual and to have the chance to help preserve them for our future sons and daughters.

Thus, I make another plea for sanctuary in your country. There is no one else I could possibly turn to. If the country I served loyally during the hard and difficult times of war, denies me a passageway to safety there is little hope left. Especially if that country is the most humanitarian of all nations. At my age, these opportunities will not come again.

Let me say that it would be an honor to serve a country with people so great that they would defend not only the rights of their own people, but also for others at the sacrifice of their own lives. My loyalty to your country is unquestionable. My gratitude for your persistent efforts on my behalf will be never-ending.

Sincerely yours,

CHI CHIA LONG.

I urge my colleagues in the House of Representatives to consider the sacrifices made by Mr. Long in ensuring the safety of many young American's fighting in Korea. This courageous man's life took a tragic change in course because of his efforts in supporting the forces of democracy. It is clear that we owe Mr. Long a great debt of gratitude and a chance to share in such democracy.

TRIBUTE TO MAYNARD RICHARD ASHWORTH

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to place into the RECORD a copy of an article that ran in the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer on Sunday, February 26, 1989, entitled "Snapshot of Columbus Patriot's Views" written by Mr. Glenn Vaughn which pays tribute to Mr. Maynard Richard Ashworth.

The article follows:

[From the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, Feb. 26, 1989]

SNAPSHOT OF COLUMBUS PATRIOT'S VIEWS

(By Glenn Vaughn)

Maynard Ashworth, who was my longtime employer, also has for years been my mentor and friend. Few among us are more keenly aware of national and world events than he, and this is to share a snapshot of his thoughts.

Being the gentleman he is, he doesn't go around spouting his opinions. But ask him what he thinks and he'll answer with clarity and candor. However, before getting into his viewpoints, let's review his credentials.

Going on 95, Maynard Richard Ashworth has lived during 44.4 percent of this nation's 213-year history.

He taught school after graduating in 1915 from what is now Central State University in Warrensburg, Mo. He has traveled throughout the nation and much of the world. He served as an Army officer in both World War I and World War II. He was a newspaperman for more than half a century, serving as publisher of the Ledger-Enquirer much of that time. He has known some of the great leaders of this century. He'a an historian. He's a patriot.

To me, he's "the colonel," not just because it is a title he earned in the Army, but because it fits one who is so distinguished. Having recovered reasonably well from two serious falls down steps at his Peachtree Drive home, Col. Ashworth is busy these days involving himself in renovation work there, including new carpets, painting and wallpapering.

"News," he told me the other day, "is sometimes so depressing, I simply have to break away from it for a while." He said thinking persons have to wonder how long our free and open society can continue allowing so much violence and greed before becoming a "controlled-state" with fewer freedoms.

"Freedom," he lamented, "must be exercised in order to keep it, and too many simply will not take part, nor even vote." He said, "Things have been so easy so long, we begin to think this way of life is just going to go on forever."

Of the federal deficit, Col. Ashworth said, "We've got to pay our bills; there's too much riding on it. We can't be beholden to foreigners. They hold us in hock when they buy our bonds to finance our debts." Unless the United States remains solvent, he said, the entire world's economy will collapse.

He deplored that "so much public revenue has been spent with so little to show for it." He added, "Everybody wants federal money, and when one group gets money from Washington, others have a right to it and the drain never ends. So many who wanted states' rights are not willing to accept the states' responsibilities that go along with those rights."

On illegal drugs, he said, "Education must be part of the solution. We must get to individuals before they become addicted." To reduce crime being committed by addicts, he wondered if confiscated narcotics might be used in a very tightly controlled "weaning process."

On overcrowded prisons: "Whatever it takes, find the money to build new facilities."

On Gorbachev's reform efforts in the Soviet Union: "If the Russians are being honest with us, they'll prove it. Until then we must not let our guard down."

On Lt. Col. Oliver North: "He's the most thoroughly knowledgeable military officer I've ever seen. In a war, I'd want him in a major role. He has been punished enough."

On the media: "While there are some good programs on CNN, C-SPAN and public television which give us an opportunity to hear persons who know what they are talking about, the media overall have too much power."

The colonel sees as the greatest danger facing this nation "the possibility that our people may lose the will to fight for the freedoms and values we cherish." He said television is portraying war as so horrible, he fears people will come to believe it is too high a price to pay for liberty's survival.

Maynard Ashworth's views—nurtured long ago largely by Horatio Alger's writings on hard work, honesty and thrift and tempered by history—deserve to be often revisited.

SOCIAL SECURITY SERVICES IMPROVEMENT ACT

HON. SANDER M. LEVIN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, with my colleague Mr. MOODY, legislation to improve the services that the Social Security Administration provides to millions of Americans, from the day they get their Social Security number until the time they begin drawing the benefits to which they are entitled.

For over 50 years, the Social Security Administration has worked with the American people to help them understand their rights and to secure their benefits. This relationship has traditionally been one of cooperation. However, there have been periods, most notably during the continuing disability reviews of the early 1980's, when this spirit of helpful assistance deteriorated into confrontation.

Recently, congressional offices have been hearing a wide variety of complaints about SSA services. Some of these are the result of the dramatic staffing reductions in the last few years. I know my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee will be carefully reviewing these cutbacks as next year's funding levels are set. Other problems appear to be the result of the policies, practices, and procedures of the SSA. Where this is the case, I believe it is incumbent upon the Congress to give direction to the SSA so that these problems do not arise.

The Social Security Services Improvement Act was developed in cooperation with several senior citizen organizations to address a number of problems our constituents are having with SSA. Last session, Mr. MOODY and I introduced similar legislation, H.R. 5250, which was the subject of a hearing before the Social Security Subcommittee on September 22. At that hearing, former Secretary of HEW and co-chairman of the Save our Security Coalition [SOS] testified that, "H.R. 5250 is targeted at precisely the types of problems that persist at SSA." The American Association of Retired Persons [AARP] said, "H.R. 5250 * * * contains important procedural protection that, if enacted, would help ensure that people receive fair, courteous and responsive treatment from SSA."

As a result of this hearing, and hundreds of letters we received from around the country, as well as the comments from the SSA, we have modified some sections and addressed several new areas. The Social Security Services Improvement Act we are introducing today is both important and responsible legislation. I am hopeful that this bill will be considered in the next few months by the Social Security Subcommittee. I urge my colleagues to join with me and help ensure that the American people are getting the respectful and helpful service to which they are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the bill appear in the RECORD immediately following these remarks.

SOCIAL SECURITY SERVICES IMPROVEMENT ACT

SEC. 1—Short Title.

SEC. 2—Standards Governing Collection of Overpayments.

This section requires the SSA to collect overpayments on a schedule which will not cause financial hardship. Overpayment notices would have to tell individuals of their right to a reasonable payment plan. In addition, beneficiaries receiving both SSI and title II payments, would be entitled to the same 10% cap on monthly withholding now in force for SSI benefits alone.

SEC. 3—Telephone Service Center Accountability Demonstrations.

In at least 3 of its 37 telephone service centers, the SSA would be required to create a system to automatically generate a letter to the caller indicating (1) the name of employee who spoke with the caller, (2) the date and nature of the call, (3) any action the SSA will take in response to the call, and (4) a summary of the information or advice the SSA gave to the caller. Of course, routine telephone contacts would not be included in this system.

These demonstration projects would help to ensure that as the SSA continues to move towards greater reliance on telephone service, beneficiaries are not hurt by a lack of records, receipts or misunderstandings that can occur in phone conversations. The demonstration will enable the SSA to develop the best method of protecting beneficiaries while continuing to improve program efficiency.

SEC. 4—Availability and Correction of Earnings Records.

The SSA would be required to tell all applicants for benefits that there have been problems with the SSA's wage credit records. Within two weeks of an application, SSA would furnish the individual with a year-by-year summary of his or her wage history, as recorded by the SSA. The individual would also be told how to get a more detailed report and how to go about correcting any errors. Finally the current 3 year, 3 month and 15 day statute of limitations would be waived for employees. Earning's records could be corrected at any time once the employee has demonstrated to the SSA his or her proper earnings.

SEC. 5—Standard for Determining Good Faith.

This section requires the SSA to take into account any particular limitations that an individual might have when determining whether that person acted in good faith. The SSA would be required to look at physical, mental, educational, or linguistic limitations.

SEC. 6—Assistance to the Homeless.

The SSA would be required to establish, within six months of enactment, a program to help homeless people to qualify for and to receive benefits to which they are entitled. Homeless people, particularly those with mental disabilities, often have trouble securing benefits because of their lack of records and a fixed address. This section also requires the SSA, at the request of a state or local government or a non-profit organization, to furnish an employee to go out to homeless shelters as part of an outreach team.

SEC. 7—Understandable Notices.

This section requires the SSA to include in all individualized notices a name, address, and telephone number of a responsible person at the SSA to contact if the recipient has any questions. The section also requires the SSA to write notices in simple and clear langauge and to the extent feasible, to provide information to non-English speakers in areas with high numbers of people with limited or no English. In addition, the special notice provisions now in effect for blind SSI recipients would be extended to all blind, disabled individuals.

SEC. 8—Representation of Claimants.

The SSA would be required to add to the computer file kept on Social Security claimants a record of the authorized attorney or other person representing the claimant. The SSA now requires an appointment of representation form to be on file before the agency will work with the representative to resolve the claimant's problem. Unfortunately, the file, together with the representation form, is often transferred to other locations, such as the disability determination service, or the Office of Hearings and Appeals, or to Baltimore. Without the original representation form, the local SSA office may refuse to work with the claimant's representative. This creates delay and frustration. This provision would help the SSA keep track of a representative. In addition, this section requires the SSA to tell applicants who receive an adverse decision how to go about getting legal assistance including free legal assistance through the local legal services office.

SEC. 9—Decision to Appeal Rather than to Reapply, Res Judicata.

Claimants who are denied a benefit may often reapply rather than appeal the adverse decision. Because of the doctrine of res judicata, they will generally lose all right to benefits up to the time of the initial decision, even if a subsequent application determines they are actually entitled to a benefit. Claimants who reapply may sometimes lose their right to any benefit if a subsequent application is delayed and they run afoul of the recency of work test. This section requires the SSA to provide claimants who receive an adverse decision with a clear explanation of the consequences of reapplying rather than appealing. In addition, if a claimant can demonstrate that the reason he or she choose to reapply rather than appeal was because of incorrect, incomplete, or misleading information provided by the SSA, then the doctrine of res judicata would not apply to that reapplication.

SEC. 10—Application Date Waiver Authority.

On occasion misinformation provided by the SSA to a potential claimant has resulted in that person not applying for benefits. Even if the SSA eventually discovers the error and begins to pay benefits, under current law, the SSA has no authority to pay benefits dating from the time when the claim would have been filed. This section would allow the SSA to pay a back claim in the particular circumstance where the SSA agrees that the claim was not filed due to misinformation provided by the SSA.

SEC. 11—Same-Day Personal Interviews.

As part of the efforts of the SSA to streamline its procedures many officers now have a policy to interview only at scheduled appointments. Beneficiaries who walk-in are given an appointment and asked to return at that time. This section would require the SSA to conduct an interview the same-day when the individual has a time-sensitive case, such as a lost check or a filing deadline for an appeal.

THE "DECADE OF THE BRAIN" RESOLUTION

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a resolution to declare a "Decade of the Brain." We are on the threshold of tremendous breakthroughs in understanding, preventing, and treating the devastating disorders that disable the brain. This resolution acknowledges this opportunity, and demonstrates our commitment to cross the threshold and to find the answers.

Support for this resolution is heartfelt and widespread among the patients, families, and physicians who cope with these brain disorders. What follows are a number of letters I have received expressing support and thanks for this resolution. I hope my colleagues will study these letters. They will tell you, better than I can, what this resolution can really mean.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF NEUROLOGY,
January 24, 1989.

Hon. SILVIO CONTE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONTE: The Academy of Neurology, representing some 10,000 neurologists and neuroscientists throughout the United States and North America, strongly endorses the "Decade of the Brain" resolution you are introducing in the 101st Congress.

This resolution underscores the significant advances science and researchers have made in recent years—and the renewed commitment that is necessary to achieve a greater understanding of neurodiseases that afflict millions of Americans, including Alzheimer's, multiple sclerosis, and Parkinson's.

Such focus is especially important at a time when Congress faces immense pressure to restrain federal spending and reduce expenditures.

We especially want to salute you for the immense energy and leadership you have brought to this issue, Mr. Congressman, and wish you success in your efforts.

We urge your fellow members in the 101st Congress to support this resolution.

Sincerely,

THEODORE L. MUNSAT, M.D.,
President.

PARKINSON'S DISEASE FOUNDATION,
New York, N.Y., January 13, 1989.

Hon. SYLVIO CONTE,
House of Representatives, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC

SIR: This letter is to congratulate you on once again introducing a resolution to establish a "Decade of the Brain."

The Parkinson's Disease Foundation endorses your efforts in this regard, and fervently hopes for your success.

With every good wish for 1989.

Sincerely,

DINAH TOTTENHAM ORR.

AMERICAN PSYCHIATRIC ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, February 8, 1989.

Hon. SILVIO CONTE,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CONTE: The American Psychiatric Association, a medical specialty society representing more than 35,000 physicians nationwide, is pleased and honored to assist you in working toward Congressional enactment of your "Decade of the Brain" resolution.

We know that the origin of this resolution lies in your tireless work on the Labor-Health and Human Services-Education Appropriations Subcommittee where as the Ranking Member you have distinguished yourself as a true champion of the nation's biomedical and behavioral research programs at the Alcohol, Drug Abuse and Mental Health Administration (ADAMHA) and the National Institutes of Health (NIH). Scores of the nation's finest scientists have annually appeared before your Subcommittee and testified that the need for knowledge in the neurosciences has never been greater and that today the nation stands on the brink of discovery. The National Library of Medicine contains nearly 100,000 publications with the term "brain" in their titles, more than double the number of such articles only 5 years ago.

You well know that passage of a "Decade of the Brain" resolution—much as annual adoption of the "Mental Illness Awareness Week" resolution of which you have always been a co-sponsor—will serve to expedite the quest for new knowledge into the nature and causes of the still poorly-understood disorders of the brain and behavior. In fact, the quest has already been accelerated with the National Advisory Mental Health Council's 1988 Report to the Congress entitled, "Approaching the 21st Century: Opportunities for NIMH Neuroscience Research," behind which you were the major impetus.

We believe, as do you, that psychiatric disorders have been too long ignored and deserve a much higher national research priority. Our members stand ready to work with you and your colleagues in Congress to increase public awareness of and subsequent public funding support for the search into the causes of mental illnesses, effective treatments and cures.

Sincerely,

MELVIN SABSHIN, M.D.,
Medical Director.

DYSTONIA MEDICAL RESEARCH FOUNDATION,
December 14, 1988.

Congressman SILVIO O. CONTE,
House Appropriations Committee,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONTE: The members of the Dystonia Medical Research Foundation wholeheartedly support your resolution to declare this the Decade of the Brain.

Dystonia is a brain disorder of unknown origin and there is no cure. Treatments have mixed results. Estimates of the number of those afflicted range between 70,000 and 100,000 with many scientists feeling the figure may well be much higher because misdiagnosis is common.

Members of Dystonia Foundation chapters, across the country, have been circulating petitions in support of your resolution and urging their senators and representatives to support it, too. A representative group of members would like to come to Washington when the Congress reconvenes and present the signed petitions to you and provide you with any information about dystonia you may wish to have.

We look forward to your reply to this request to meet with you at your convenience.

Sincerely yours,

GRACE URROWS.

AMERICAN COLLEGE OF NEUROPSYCHOPHARMACOLOGY,
March 2, 1989.

Hon. SILVIO O. CONTE,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONTE: The American College of Neuropsychopharmacology (ACNP) is a professional organization of some 500 leading scientists. Members are selected primarily on the basis of their original research contributions to the field of neuropsychopharmacology, which involves the evaluation of the effects of natural products and synthetic compounds upon the brain and human behavior. At its recent meeting in Washington, our Council voted formally to congratulate you, and thank you, for introducing your resolution to declare a "Decade of the Brain".

We greatly respect and appreciate your willingness to carefully study the testimony of the nation's best scientists as they present new findings in treatment and research opportunities in neuroscience before the Appropriations Committee. To people with brain-related diseases and disorders, to those with drug and alcohol addictions, and to their families and caregivers—you and your legislative efforts have been a steady source of hope.

We are ready to do all we can to spread the word about the importance of your resolution, and to encourage other members of Congress to follow your direction and to support your initiative. Thank you again for your leadership in this promising area of research. Please let us know how we can help.

Sincerely,

OAKLEY RAY, Ph.D.,
Secretary.

TRIBUTE TO ARCHBISHOP BORDERS

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, today I have the distinct pleasure to honor a man whose love of God and devotion to his church has helped to make him a force of spiritual strength and welcome social change for all the citizens of Baltimore. We in Maryland shall honor Archbishop William Donald Borders—a gentleman who has presided over the powerful Archdiocese of Baltimore with great care and wisdom since 1974. His genuine concern for all people, however, has endeared him to people of all faiths. Soon this great man shall turn his awesome responsibilities over to another, leaving behind a record of achievement which speaks for itself. Tonight the people of Baltimore are coming together to thank him for his goods works. I would first, however, like to take this chance to thank him in my own way.

Archbishop Borders started this climb up the ecclesiastical ladder in 1932, when he began studying for the priesthood at the youthful age of 19. He was ordained in 1940 and soon decided to serve his country as a chaplain in the military—a choice which eventually earned him a major's rank. After the war he earned a Master's degree in education and built for himself a reputation as a concerned and capable young priest in the New Orleans area.

His talents did not go unnoticed by the Vatican. Pope Paul VI selected Borders as first bishop of the newly formed Diocese of Orlando, FL. Bishop Borders used his position to fight for the things he believed in—such as quality education, the Vatican II reforms, and increased organizational efficiency within the church. His selection as Archbishop of Baltimore only increased his devotion to these issues. Today Archbishop Borders has become a nationally respected figure within the church—one whose opinion is regularly consulted on many matters affecting church policy.

Mr. Speaker, Archbishop Borders is truly a special individual—a man who has certainly endeared himself to his elders in the church as well as the laity. Though he will be missed once he has retired, his contributions shall long serve as the monument by which he will always be remembered. Baltimore is indeed a better place for having been blessed with his presence.

Thank you, Archbishop, and congratulations for a job well done.

ABUSE OF FLAG IN CHICAGO VIOLATES FEDERAL LAW

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, there is a grave situation developing in Chicago. A self-proclaimed "supporter of the Revolutionary Communist Party U.S.A." is defaming the pride and symbol of this Nation. He has created an art project that places Old Glory on the floor beneath a montage of photos and a book for which comments may be made. This so-called artistical display entitled "What is the proper way to display the flag?" has so enraged the masses that a lawsuit was filed and subsequently dismissed, protests launched, and resolutions introduced in the Illinois General Assembly to cut funding to the School of the Art Institute which stand by this display of disrespect.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of free speech. This display is a violation of the United States Code. Title 36, section 176(b) states, and I quote, "the flag should never touch anything beneath it, such as the ground, the floor, water or merchandise." The code is extremely clear. It says the flag shall not touch the ground. It does not make the distinction of whether the floor is clean, as the uninformed Judge Kenneth Gillis did in ruling on a suit filed to remove the exhibit. This judge ruled that the school had not violated State and Federal criminal laws that prohibit placing marks on the flag or mutilating, defacing or trampling it. Judge Gillis went on to say that "placing the flag on the floor is not mutilating, defacing or trampling it." Well, somebody needs to correct this judge. We, the Members of the Congress of the United States have given all the guidance he needs on this issue. The flag shall not touch the ground.

And what about Mr. Tyler. If this individual has no respect for this country and its symbols then I suggest that he search his soul for what he really wants. As Americans, we have the right to stand up and be counted. We have elections to determine leadership and freedom of expression to say we disagree with the way our elected officials behave. As Americans, we have freedom of speech to say we object but there comes a point when we violate the rights of others. Mr. Tyler has an obvious disrespect for this country and its symbols. In the process, he also defames all of our forefathers who have built this Nation. He defames the fathers, husbands, and sons who have given their lives to defend this country. He defames the soldiers and sailors today who serve under Old Glory in defending our shores from the likes of those whom he embraces. He defames the citizens of this country who pledge allegiance to the flag every day and who wake up every morning, glad that they are living in "the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Mr. Speaker, I conclude in saying that I am proud to be an American. I am proud of those individuals who have "made it safe for democracy." I am proud to wake up every morning and drive to the these hallowed halls where the symbol of the United States flies proudly and brilliantly from atop this building. I salute the stars and stripes of our flag and know in my heart that it is the symbol of the most precious gift, freedom. I urge the dismantling of this so-called expression of art based on the clear violations stated in the United States Code, title 36, section 176(b).

READING IS CONTAGIOUS IN SCHOOL DISTRICT 26

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to bring to your attention the outstanding work that is being performed by the students, faculty, and administrators of Community School District 26 in Queens County, NY. The tremendous effort put forth by everyone in this district has helped it attain the highest ranking among New York City's 32 school districts in a survey of reading scores conducted by the Board of Education. Special commendation should also go to P.S. 205, which finished third out of the 616 New York City public schools. I would like to congratulate District Superintendent Irwin Altman, the president of the school board, Marylen Daly, and the principal of P.S. 205, Alvin Topol.

As a former school teacher in Queens County, I am well aware of the strong commitment toward educational fundamentals which is so prominent throughout our schools. In a time when some educational standards are sliding downward, it is very encouraging to see a school district perform so admirably. I thought that my colleagues might be interested in a recent article written by Jack Leahy that appeared in the New York Daily News on February 17, 1989. This story highlights the tremendous work that is being done in School District 26.

TEACHING READIN' IS RIGHT IN PS 205

SCHOOL DISTRICT 26 BEST OF ITS CLASS CITYWIDE

(By Jack Leahy)

Rock music and TV cartoons have their place, but not at Public School 205 in Bayside, where kids enjoy classical music during daily individual reading sessions.

The practice paid off yesterday when the school on Bell Blvd. and 75th Ave. placed third among the city's 616 schools on the Board of Education's list of reading scores.

PS 205's high ranking helped School District 26, which covers northeastern Queens, to first place among the city's 32 districts. None of the 20 elementary and five junior high schools in the district finished lower than 140th on the list, and four made the top 20.

PS 205 97 PERCENT ABOVE AVERAGE

At PS 205, the Alexander Graham Bell School, 97% of the 280 pupils are reading at or above the average level for their grade, according to the Board of Education. Last year, the school was in 31st place with an 89.8% average.

Principal Alvin Topol attributed its success in reading to "great kids, dedicated and experienced teachers and parental involvement."

One program, dubbed DEAR, for Drop Everything and Read, allots 20 minutes daily in school and calls for at least a book of the youngster's choice, Topol said.

"Each class is periodically assigned five novels, like 'Robinson Crusoe,' or biographies, like 'Helen Keller,' and the children are allowed to read one of them for DEAR," Topol said. "We play classical music over the classroom speaker while they're reading, and the kids just love it."

Stefani DeZorett, a reading teacher at Public School 24 in adjacent District 25, has two children, Robert 6, and Jason, 9, in PS 205. She said they are encouraged to read by frequent book-report assignments, school clubs and a program that offers coupons for free pizza slices as enticements for completing two or three novels.

"Reading is contagious within the school," said DeZorett, whose husband, Michael, is a lawyer, "and it carries over when my children come home. They want to go to the library and get more books to read besides those they get in school."

Like all of the schools in District 26, PS 205 is in a predominantly white, middleclass neighborhood. Minority students are bused in from other districts, however, and seem to do as well in reading as neighborhood youngsters do.

At PS 205, for example, about 20% of the students are black, Topol noted. They are bused from as far away as St. Albans to attend the kindergarten-through-fifth-grade school.

BUSING HELPS

With only 11,500 students, District 26 is one of the smallest in the city, and busing from other districts helps to fill classroom seats that otherwise would add to the empty space.

Helene Zaro, first vice president of Board 26, said the district's reputation for good schools attracts teachers and principals, as well as students who have an option to go to them.

"I have been on the school board for almost 16 years and, for as long as I can remember, we have always been up there on the top in reading scores," Zaro said.

JUSTICE IN EL SALVADOR

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to applaud the efforts of the Salvadoran Government to punish those responsible for death squad activity in that war-torn country. Despite mind-boggling civilian casualties in the 9-year-old civil war there, and despite convincing evidence that elements of the military are involved in human rights abuses, no officer had been charged with human rights violations until yesterday. Yesterday three officers were charged in the deaths of 10 peasants near the town of San Sebastian on September 21, 1988. These three were named on a list presented to the Salvadoran military by Vice President QUAYLE on his visit in February as having particularly strong ties to death squad activity. In addition, a brigade commander was removed from his post in connection with this tragic incident.

I also commend the American Ambassador to San Salvador, the Honorable William Walker, for his offer of assistance to the judge in this case, Edis Alcides Guandique. The judge who was originally assigned this case, resigned after receiving death threats. Intimidation of judges when human rights abuses are being investigated is nothing new to El Salvador, but is a practice that cannot continue if El Salvador is to break the vicious cycle of violence that grips that country.

Human rights violations in El Salvador must come to an end. I visited El Salvador in January and found a climate of instability, permeated by the threat of violence. For the sake of the Salvadoran people, an equitable resolution to the civil war and an end to human rights violations must be achieved.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ON OFFICE SITING RULES FOR SEWAGE FACILITY BONDS

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, I am introducing legislation today to respond to complaints which I have received concerning State and local governments, or agencies or instrumentalities of these units, which issue tax-free bonds for sewage facilities or treatment. What we have discovered is that these issuers will construct management offices for sewage treatment facilities away from the actual cleanup site.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I can't conceive of one reason that a water authority's management office would be constructed miles from a cleanup site. Under present law, offices associated with projects financed with tax-free bonds funding private activities such as sewage treatment plans must be located at the site of the project. This rule was added to the Tax Reform Act of 1986 when the Committee on Ways and Means marked up that legislation in the fall of 1985.

As one of the authors of that amendment, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we did not apply these rules to governmental bonds because no one in their wildest imagination would have assumed that governmental agencies—those who must be accountable and responsible to the taxpayers—would have ever considered constructing luxury office buildings with tax-free bond proceeds, at a location away from the project underlying the bonds.

But lo and behold, in my own State of Massachusetts, this is precisely what is happening. A State agency, charged with the important responsibility of cleaning up our waterways, is deciding to spend tens of millions of dollars on a luxury office building miles away from the actual site of the cleanup.

The taxpayers of Massachusetts—and, the taxpayers of this country—are providing an enormously generous subsidy by not subjecting to tax interest on obligations of State and local governments. These taxpayers have a right to know that the management offices of a water authority responsible for the cleanup will be on the premises of the cleanup site, not in some luxurious office building miles away. Those responsible for cleaning up our Nation's waterways should be accountable to the people of the community which they are supposed to serve.

To end this abuse of public trust and accountability, and to end it now, my bill makes changes to the tax-free bond rules of the Internal Revenue Code. A description of present law, and my proposed changes, follows.

PRESENT LAW

Interest on obligations of State and local governments is exempt from tax under authority of section 103 of the Internal Revenue Code. In the case of private activity bonds, interest is taxable unless a specific Code provision operates to exclude the interest from taxation.

One class of private activity bonds which are generally tax-exempt are "exempt facility bonds". Exempt facility bonds are, however, subject to several restrictions. For example, exempt facility bonds are subject to a volume cap, which limits the amount of private activity bonds which a State may issue.

Another restriction imposed on exempt facility bonds is a limitation on office space and is contained in section 142(b)(2)(A) of the Code. Generally, an exempt facility bond will not be tax-exempt unless any office associated with the facility is located on the premises of the facility. That site restriction does not apply, however, in the case of governmental bonds.

EXPLANATION OF PROVISION

The bill extends the site restriction, discussed above, to governmental bonds issued to provide sewage facilities. Thus, for a governmental bond providing sewage facilities (in whole or in part) to be tax-exempt, any office space related to the management of sewage (e.g., management offices of water authorities) must be located on the premises of a sewage facility.

For purposes of this rule, the term "sewage facility" is defined by reference to Treas. Regs. 1.103-8(f)(2)(i) (i.e., any property used for the collection, storage, treatment, utilization, processing, of final disposal of sewage). In addition, the intent of the legislation is to apply the functionally related and subordinate rules of Treas. Regs. 1.103-8(a)(3) to governmental bonds used to provide sewage facilities. Thus, the "premises" of a sewage facility includes any land, building, or other property functionally related and subordinate to such facility.

The restriction on office premises would not apply if no more than a minor portion of the proceeds of the issue are used to provide office space. For purposes of this rule, "minor portion" means the lesser of 5% of the proceeds of the issue, or $100,000.

The provision applies as well to State revolving loans funds. For example, if a State has a fund out of which it will loan bond proceeds to clean up a waterway in the State, the provision requires that offices servicing the treatment facility be located on the site being treated.

EFFECTIVE DATE

The provision is generally effective for bonds issued after December 31, 1990. A more restrictive effective date is provided, however, in the case of State agencies created after December 31, 1984 that are not yet fully operational. A State agency is not yet fully operational if, for example, it has only issued an insignificant portion of the long-term debt it expected to issue, or if it has not yet begun substantial work on any of the sites it is required to treat or clean. An agency is also not yet fully operational if its final office site is not yet chosen. In the case of these agencies, the provision applies to bonds issued after March 9, 1989.

No inference is intended, with respect to the December 31, 1990 effective date, that an earlier date could not be chosen by the Committee on Ways and Means when action is taken on this bill. In no event, however, would I support an effective date earlier than the date of Committee action with respect to the effective date of general application in the legislation.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that a rule that is good enough for private activities is doubly good for governmental activities. If the tax laws impose an office site requirement on private purpose bonds financing sewage treatment facilities, then a similar rule should apply to governmental bonds. Governments should be responsible to the people they serve. This legislation is good tax policy, and good public policy.

CARACAS SEETHES, WASHINGTON SNOOZES

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, last week's violence in democratic Venezuela highlights the need for immediate, dramatic debt reduction in Latin America. As the Venezuelan riots demonstrate, people in Latin America are at the end of their rope. They have endured almost 7 years of severe economic decline. Living standards have declined dramatically. Now, more than ever, there is risk of widespread popular unrest, which could jeopardize the democratic movement in Latin America. Clearly, it is in our economic and foreign policy interests to reduce these nation's debt burdens. Debt reduction could stimuate economic growth and reduce the political turmoil in these countries. My bill, H.R. 1103, the World Trade Expansion, Development, and Financial Stability Act of 1989, would provide debt relief of a magnitude that would make a real difference.

I commend to my colleagues the following editorial from the New York Times. The article makes an excellent case for debt relief. I hope that the administration, which is presently devising its debt strategy, will also recognize the wisdom of these ideas.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 3, 1989]

CARACAS SEETHES, WASHINGTON SNOOZES

"The I.M.F. set fire to the streets of Caracas," screamed a Venezulan newspaper this week as riots left hundreds dead in what had been one of Latin America's most stable democracies.

The charge isn't quite fair. The deal now being worked out between the four-week-old Government of Carlos Andrés Pérez and the International Monetary Fund merely put the match to a combustible mixture that has been building for years, and not just in Venezuela. Unless the Bush Administration accelerates its promised debt relief proposals, the flames could spread to many other Latin American democracies.

President Pérez inherited a desperate economic crisis. Venezuela's economy, heavily dependent on oil, helped it produce one of the region's highest living standards and one of its most moderate political cultures.

Since the early 1980's, however, plunging oil prices have sliced profits from oil exports by two-thirds. Venezuela maintained its debt payments and domestic spending only by running down foreign exchange reserves. Those reserves are now almost wiped out.

Whether oil-related or not, similar financial crunches now affect Mexico, Costa Rica, Peru, Colombia, Ecuador, Bolivia, Argentina and Brazil. As a result some have predicted, the string of Latin American democracies scheduled to vote in the coming months could well elect radical populists preaching debt repudiation, anti-Americanism and autarky. Many counted Carlos Andrés Pérez in that populist camp.

Instead, Mr. Pérez has applied the kind of strict and unpopular orthodoxy Washington preaches, including currency devaluation, higher interest rates and sharply increased prices for fuels and public transportation. The last of these measures touched off the violence.

The Bush Administration, in office two weeks longer than Mr. Pérez, has yet to wake up to the urgency of the crisis by producing a plausible debt relief plan. Congress last year ordered the Treasury to report on international debt by Feb. 23. Treasury won a three-week delay. The Administration offers encouraging rhetoric about the need for new approaches, but no plans. And the State Department still has no new Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs.

Debt relief could take various forms. Bank regulators might be asked to tolerate some loan forgiveness. Greater use might be made of the secondary market, where Latin debt now trades at less than 50 cents on the dollar. Or Government-sponsored institutions might swap existing i.o.u.'s for some new type of guaranteed bond. Most likely any plan would ask debtors to swallow difficult economic reforms as the price of relief.

Venezuela adopted such reforms without waiting for relief. But it has paid a heavy human and political price. How long must it now wait for Washington to wake up?

THE WHOLE WORLD MUST STOP CFC PRODUCTION

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, everyone around the globe is talking about swift action to stop the destruction of the ozone layer by chlorofluorocarbons. I am particularly pleased by the response of Great Britain and Prime Minister Thatcher. Prime Minister Thatcher has reversed her position and now calls for "a truce on the assault on the atmosphere." I couldn't agree more.

The response of developing countries is that while they would like to stop using the chemicals, they still need them to catch up to the industrial world. I appreciate this reasoning.

I believe the United States should take a strong leadership role in ending the production of CFC's. To this end, I have introduced legislation to put an excise tax on CFC's. This is to raise the price high enough to bring alternative, environmentally sound chemicals into production.

An important component of the legislation is the trade section. We cannot let other countries use destructive CFC's in manufacturing processes or for refrigeration systems and then ship the goods to the United States. The bill imposes a tax on the importation of goods into the United States that were made with or contain CFC's.

CFC's made elsewhere are just as effective in destroying ozone as the homemade brand. Developing countries must not be allowed to compete with our industry using cheap, destructive CFC's while we are using more expensive, benign substitutes.

I would like to include in the RECORD an article from the Washington Post that reviews the current world debate on CFC's.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 8, 1989]

CONFERENCE ENDS AT ODDS ON PACE OF OZONE EFFORTS

(By Jonathan C. Randal)

LONDON, March 7.—A 123-nation conference to save the ozone layer ended here today with U.S. and European Community recognition that many other nations will lag behind the West's pledge to accelerate elimination of chemicals threatening the atmosphere's vulnerable shield.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher told a final news conference that "in practice" there "probably will be a two-speed system," with the precise pace to be determined at a follow-up conference in Helsinki in May. Then governments will review scientific, industrial and other data and decide how to implement phasing out of chemicals called chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) whose damage to the ozone has been blamed for skin cancer, cataracts and harm to the immune system.

William K. Reilly, U.S. Environmental Protection Agency administrator, told reporters that discussions with China, India, the Soviet Union and other countries here had persuaded him that it was "perfectly understandable" for them to "stick to the [original] timetable" of phasing out half their CFCs by the end of the century.

"I came here with a different impression from what I am taking away," he said, explaining that he had wanted to "torque the process" and "move decisions up" after the 12-nation European Community and the United States decided last week to phase out all CFCs by 2000.

Behind this assessment lay increased understanding for Third World concerns about developed nations' willingness to share and subsidize newly available substitute chemicals and for Moscow's reluctance to accelerate compliance because Soviet scientists are said to be less pessimistic than their western colleagues.

Nonetheless, Thatcher and other speakers hailed the three-day conference for speeding up world consciousness about the need to phase out CFCs, which are used as aerosol propellants, and in computer hardware, medicines and refrigerator and air conditioner coolants.

Although Thatcher insisted "our goal must be nothing less" than having all countries sign up, she said "it augurs well for the future" that 20 more countries now have said they will adhere to the 1987 Montreal Protocol on phasing out 50 percent of CFCs by 2000. Thirty-one countries had signed and ratified it earlier and 19 more countries said they were "seriously considering" doing so, according to conference documents.

Even if all CFC use ended today, Thatcher said, "damage already done to the ozone layer will be with us, our children and our grandchildren throughout the 21st century." She added that only "common action" with "every country playing its part" could bring relief, or what another speaker called "a truce in our assault on the atmosphere."

Mostafa K. Tolba, executive director of the U.N. Environment Program, which cosponsored the conference, touched on the delicate question of financing the expected greater costs of replacing CFCs by suggesting that "an agreed additional percentage of development assistance be specifically allocated."

China, India and other Third World countries have made clear they do not want the added costs of CFC substitutes deducted from foreign development assistance. Tolba also proposed an "internationally agreed plan to raise extra resources" that could include debt remission favoring environmental protection, use of resources freed by disarmament and innovative tax incentives.

The United States has suggested that international institutions, especially the World Bank, as well as Japan and the European Community shoulder most of the financial burden.

Further complicating the industrialized world's response was Britain's determination to avoid setting up new institutions, as is favored by France and apparently by some leading Third World powers.

New Zealand Environment Minister Geoffrey Palmer said scientific data had shown that the Montreal Protocol is "inadequate." He called for a "bold new approach to the development of international law" for environmental problems.

He said "the traditional system of developing international law into international legal standards in small incremental steps, each of which must subsequently be ratified before it comes into effect, is simply not equipped to deal with the fast-moving crisis of environmental problems which we face."

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PROVIDE FOR THE DREDGING OF MORRO BAY HARBOR

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill, as is my colleague in the Senate, Senator PETE WILSON, to direct the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to take action to remedy an extremely dangerous condition at the entrance to Morro Bay Harbor in California. The bill requires the corps, upon a favorable recommendation by the Chief of Engineers, to dredge the harbor to a depth of 40 feet, to modify the entrance to the harbor, and to take other actions necessary to make the harbor safe.

This action is critical. Extremely high waves at the entrance to the harbor regularly create dangerous navigation conditions. Since 1964, at least 21 individuals have lost their lives attempting to navigate the entrance. The most recent death occurred on November 9, 1987, and involved a man widely regarded as one of the area's most experienced and careful commercial fishermen. In addition, there have been terrifying accidents in which loss of life has been avoided only by heroic rescue efforts. The most dramatic of these accidents was the capsizing in 1983 of the San Mateo, a 45-foot whale-watching vessel carrying 23 schoolchildren and several adults. It is ironic in light of these deaths and accidents, that Morro Bay Harbor is the only port of refuge between Monterey and Santa Barbara, along the often treacherous waters of the California coast.

The corps has completed a reconnaissance report and is proceeding with a feasibility study regarding Morro Bay Harbor. This legislation will allow the corps to begin work on the dredging as soon as the feasibility study is completed and the Chief of Enginneers makes a favorable recommendation. Because of the vital importance of this work, I believe that further delay would be dangerous.

Unless remedial action is taken as soon as possible, additional lives will be needlessly lost and endangered. In addition, concern within the fishing and boating community about the dangerous conditions in the harbor may also result in a diminution in use of the harbor, causing economic harm to Morro Bay and those who depend on the harbor for their livelihood.

The legislation which I am introducing would direct the corps to do the work necessary to make the harbor safe again. It would also remove any doubt as to the corps' authority to do the deeper dredging work. Most importantly, it would restore the harbor as a port which can be safely used and enjoyed, and which can offer refuge to all vessels in distress. Last year similar language was included in the House-passed version of the Water Resources Development Act. At that time the Public Works Committee and the House recognized the importance and necessity of this work and it is my hope that the same sort of committee can be reached this again year. I look forward to working with the committee and hope for passage of this bill.

Following is the text of the bill:

H.R. 1357

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the navigation project for Morro Bay, California, authorized by section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes", approved March 2, 1945 (59 Stat. 21), is modified to direct the Secretary of the Army, acting through the Chief of Engineers—

(1) contingent upon a favorable recommendation by the Chief of Engineers, to extend and deepen the entrance channel for Morro Bay Harbor to a depth of 40 feet not later than six months after completion of a feasibility study by the Corps of Engineers regarding such project and thereafter maintain such channel at such depth; and

(2) to carry out and maintain such other improvements at such harbor as the Chief of Engineers determines to be necessary to allow safe navigation into and out of such harbor.

THE 71ST ANNIVERSARY OF THE REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, there is no story braver than that of the Lithuanian people. Over its long span of existence the Lithuanian Nation has been involved in numerous conflicts, struggles, and wars in the name of maintaining its identity against the continued encroachment of others. It has endured despite these odds.

No challenge, however, is as great as that which it faces today. Since the end of World War II Lithuania has been trapped in the clutches of Soviet communism—unable to break free of the bonds which deprived the fledgling Baltic State of its freedoms.

Last month we celebrated the 71st anniversary of the founding of the Republic of Lithuania after the World War I. Below are remarks which I gave at an event sponsored by Baltimore's Lithuanian community on February 12. It is with respect to this brave and noble people that I submit them here:

STATEMENT BY HON. HELEN BENTLEY IN HONOR OF THE 71ST ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF THE INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC OF LITHUANIA

It's an honor and a privilege to have been asked to participate in this celebration of your Lithuanian identity today. While I am not Lithuanian—instead I am a full-blooded Serb—I feel that certain similarities between our two peoples nonetheless bond us together in a very special way. Both are proud peoples who have struggled to maintain a sense of ethnicity despite the pressures put upon us by other Nations. Both have suffered intolerance and persecution as a result of our defiance.

However, the most important thing is that your people as well as mine have survived these challenges. Today you stand together in homage of the brave little Lithuanian State which was formed after the end of World War I. The history of this tiny Lithuanian Republic is indeed one of noble men, bold actions, and a willingness to resist the odds stacked so heavily against national independence in an age when Europe was engulfed in war and flames.

I salute the fine souls who laid the foundations upon which the Lithuanian Republic was built—for the love of liberty they demonstrated shall serve as a beacon of hope throughout the ages. Yet I also salute each of you as well, for the willingness you have shown to maintain strong cultural ties is not often seen in our "melting pot" society. You deserve to be most proud of your heritage, for even in the face of Soviet domination the Lithuanian people have remained strong and proud.

I submit that any student in history who wants to learn about bravery should take his cue from the Lithuanians. Indeed there is no story more inspiring or fulfilling to be found.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE SILBERFEIN

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to an extraordinary man. On March 18, George Silberfein will be celebrating his 80th birthday. Mr. Silberfein was born in New York, to immigrant parents Sara Esther Finelt and Solomon Silberfein, who came to America seeking religious and personal freedom. Like millions of other families, the Silberfeins brought with them little else but the dream that was America and the desire to contribute to its enrichment.

The family settled in Brooklyn and George was born fifth of eight children. His brothers Murray, Harry, and Mickey and his sisters Rose, Jessie, Florrie, and Shirley were used to having family dinner at a table large enough to accommodate not only their family, but a seemingly never-ending stream of immigrants from the old country who were told to make the Silberfeins their first stop when they got to America. A warm bed and some helpful advice were always to be had before setting out on one's own way. This spirit of caring and giving was instilled in George at a very young age and has stayed with him.

He was taught that America represented not only opportunity, but a responsibility as well. George was taught that he had a responsibility to help others in their struggle to achieve opportunity in America; that even the newest Americans must begin to give something of themselves back to America.

While attending Boys High, he was manager of the cross country track team. He graduated in January 1927, and then attended Brooklyn City College in the evenings where he was vice president of student activities, while working in the family business during the day.

A few years later, when George owned a thriving factory on Long Island, he saw to it that any employee of his that wanted to buy a house was not deprived of that dream because of racial, religious, or other discriminatory reasons. On some occasions, he would personally purchase the house and then turn it over to the family and stand guard as the community took time to get acquainted to their new neighbors.

George Silberfein took an interest in helping build his community. He was a founder of the Temple Beth-El Jewish Center and of the Huntington, NY, Police Athletic League. He also founded the Huntington Station Cab Co. and S. Silberfein & Sons, a dress contracting factory on New York Avenue in Huntington, named after his father.

George was president of his synagogue and headed the 1947 airlift of supplies to Israel. He was vice president and on the board of directors of the Walt Whitman Savings Bank, a member of the Knights of Columbus, the Rotary Club, and the Chamber of Commerce. He was also a member of the Knights of Pythias for 45 years. He served on the board of governors of Cold Spring Country Club and found time to play enough golf to be class C club champion three times.

He has been honored by the American Red Cross in recognition of meritorious service performed for the Nation during World War II and has worked for many years contributing to the Jewish National Fund for Israel.

In addition to the many other honors he has received during his exceptional lifetime, he was also honored some 65 years ago when Ann Permut, also born to newly arrived American immigrants, became his bride. Their marriage is a testament to love. Their happiness, and the happiness and encouragement they have brought to others, through their acts of kindness, courage, and generosity, and by the example of their own lives, truly represent not only the fulfillment of the promise of America, but also the realization that often people put far more into America than they could ever get back in return.

In May 1979, George and his wife moved to Hillcrest in Hollywood, FL. For most people that would mean retirement, but George tries to keep active in the dress business and is a board member of his condominium.

Ann and George have passed on their parent's hopes and determination to their three children: Judy, Michael, and Steve, as well as their eight grandchildren: Steve, Sue, Richie, Andy, Jimmy, Adam, Scott, and Jason.

Loved by family and friends, George always has a solution to any problem. He is never too busy to help someone and never too tired to take on organizing another worthwile cause.

It is said that if you want to get something done, ask a busy man to take care of it—George Silberfein is that man.

Mr. Speaker, I ask all my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join me in tribute to this outstanding American, George Silberfein.

NATIONAL FUTURE FARMERS OF AMERICA WEEK

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to again recognize the members of the Future Farmers of America. They recently celebrated National FFA Week with the theme "FFA—Agriculture's Leading Edge."

The Future Farmers of America is a vocational education organization for high school students who are enrolled in vocational agricultural classes in public high schools or area vocational education centers.

Each chapter develops an annual program of activities, and each member of the chapter carries out a Supervised Occupational Experience Program. The FFA gives recognition to members for achievements at the chapter, district or area, State, and national levels. These award programs directly relate to the Supervised Occupational Experience Programs. This allows each vocational education-FFA member the opportunity to participate and receive recognition.

During the 1987–88 school year there were 147 FFA chapters in Kentucky, with a membership of 12,348. Over 1,000 FFA members and teachers attended a week of FFA leadership development training at the Kentucky Leadership Training Center in Hardinsburg, KY.

The FFA chapters, and the individual members, that are in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the privilege of representing in the Congress, received many awards at the State and national levels during the past year.

Dow Rasdall of Smiths Grove was recognized at the 1988 National FFA Computers in Agriculture Conference as one of the top five FFA members for integrating computers into his agriculture program and FFA chapter. He was named fourth runner-up at the National FFA Convention.

Chuck Fleming of Franklin (Cereal Grain Production), Robin M. Davis of Clarkson (Diversified Livestock Production), Mark Glasscock of Taylorsville (Forest Management), Timmy D. Herndon of Mt. Eden (Floriculture), Justin Marsh of Scottsville (Poultry Production), Kevin H. Trunnel of Utica (Soil & Water Management), and Chris Searcy of Fisherville in the Spencer County Chapter (Wildlife Management) all were 1988 State winners of Proficiency Awards and competed at the National FFA Convention. Robin Davis was named a national winner and Mark Glasscock was named a regional winner at the National Convention.

The Spencer County Chapter was the 1988 FFA Building Our American Communities Program winner and received a silver emblem award at the National FFA Convention. Area award plaques were presented to Shelly Law (Daviess County Chapter), Kevin Trunnel (Apollo Chapter), Robert Stover (Franklin-Simpson Chapter), Sammy Lowe (Barren County Chapter), David Pace (Warren Central Chapter), Bill Pearson (Warren East Chapter), David Geary (Grayson County Chapter), Dana Tucker (Breckinridge County Chapter), Melida Nett (East Hardin Chapter), and Timmy Herndon (Spencer County Chapter) at the State FFA Convention.

The Spencer County Chapter was also the State winner of the Chapter Farm Safety Contest at the State FFA Convention and regional winners included the Barren County and Breckinridge County Chapters.

The Kentucky Association FFA honored 20 top vocational agriculture students and FFA members at the State FFA Convention. Scott D. Jernigan of Franklin, Wendel R. Eby of Willisburg, and Timmy Herndon of Mt. Eden were recognized as Regional Star Agribusinessmen and Gregory L. Willoughby of Scottsville and Kelly Flanders of Buffalo were recognized as Regional Star Farmers. Gregory Willoughby was also selected Kentucky Star Farmer.

The 1988–89 FFA State officers from the Second Congressional District are Shannon Morgan of Alvaton, president of the Kentucky Association FFA, and Dana Tucker of Hardinsburg, who is vice president. Brad Chambliss of Hardinsburg was elected national FFA vice president for the central region at the National FFA Convention.

The American Farmer is FFA's highest degree and those who receive this degree have demonstrated to their association that they have fulfilled the requirements: at least $5,000 earned and invested from an outstanding Supervised Occupational Educational Program, exemplary leadership abilities, active membership in FFA for at least 36 months and successful completion of a high school agriculture program. The following were recognized at the American Farmer Degree Ceremony at the National FFA Convention: Robert Chapman of Woodburn, Robin M. Davis of Clarkson, J. Douglas Eades of Mount Eden, Kevin R. Greathouse of Bowling Green, and Scott Travis of Cox's Creek.

FAA Chapters were given recognition at the National FFA Convention for their excellence in activities such as community service, leadership, public relations and supervised occupational educational programs. The Barren County and Spencer County Chapters were presented with gold emblem awards and the Apollo, Breckinridge County, and Daviess County Chapters received bronze emblem awards. The Spencer County Chapter was also recognized for its exceptional efforts to improve the safety and health of its community and received a gold National Safety Award.

Shannon Morgan of Alvaton and Dana A. Tucker of Hardinsburg were the official delegates to the National FFA Convention from the State of Kentucky, and David L. Duncan of Franklin was recognized at the National FFA Convention as a State Winner of the Agriscience Teacher of the Year Award.

I am proud of all the members of the Future Farmers of America and I know of no group of young people who are accomplishing more in the area of agriculture. I want to commend all of them for their efforts and achievements, and I wish them continued success in all their future endeavors.

THE GUAM EXCESS FEDERAL LANDS ACT OF 1989

HON. BEN BLAZ

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. BLAZ. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill today to return 3,500 acres of excess military lands in Guam to their original landowners or their heirs. Land has always been precious in Guam. It became all the more so after World War II, when one-third of the territory was taken for the construction of military bases. Much of the land that sits behind the base perimeters in Guam has never been used for military purposes. As Guam's economy has grown, so has the need for useful land increased. After years of rapid development, our tourism economy now finds itself hemmed in by the absence of suitable sites on which to construct additional facilities. Our goal of economic self-sufficiency is within our grasp, but we need the means to reach our goal, and those means are 3,500 acres of Government land which have been declared excess by the Department of Defense.

During the 100th Congress I introduced a nearly identical bill, H.R. 2601, to facilitate the return of these excess lands. Both the administration and the people of Guam registered their approval of the basic concept of the bill.

We have chosen the superior court of Guam as the appropriate mechanism to ensure the expeditious and fair return of these lands to their original owners. The lands will be transferred temporarily to the superior court until the identities of the original landowners are determined. Where the original owners have died, probate proceedings will determine the heirs and their shares. The lands will then be returned to the appropriate persons as determined by the superior court pursuant to the probate laws of Guam. We have chosen the probate procedure of the superior court of Guam to administer the return of these excess lands because it is an existing local procedure with a proven track record. Any person claiming a right to any of the excess lands will have his or her day in court. This is also the quickest means of returning these lands to their rightful owners. The superior court approach also avoids the failures of other procedures tried in the past to return Government land to the private sector. Those means, such as land corporations or land trusts, have in the past fallen short of their goals due to cumbrous procedures and insufficient capitalization.

This bill recognizes the many benefits which flow from private ownership and use of land. Guam will thrive most in proportion to the amount of excess Federal lands which are returned to the private sector. This bill accomplishes this vital task with the minimum of Federal and local governmental involvement.

As Guam's economy has developed through the years, so has its political aspirations. We in Guam have embarked on a voyage of political self-determination—a desire on our part for greater local autonomy and an equal place in the American political family. We are confident that if we have the tools with which to blaze our own economic development, we would one day cease to be dependent on national appropriations for our basic needs.

REFORM MATHEMATICS EDUCATION

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the alarming decline in the competence of American students in mathematics and the sciences is the most serious threat to our Nation since the Soviet Union launched Sputnik in 1957. Indeed the threat is greater now than then because there are many nations poised today to take from us the technical leadership that has so long assured our place in the world. Today I am calling on my colleagues to consider some of the factors that have created this dangerous situation and some of the steps Congress must take to meet it.

More than any other academic subject, mathematics and its associated problem-solving skills are critical to our national scientific research capability and to our capacity to remain a technological leader. Yet, Mr. Speaker, studies currently show that, beginning in junior high school, the number of our students taking math courses declines 50 percent each year. Currently, three of four American high school students do not have sufficient math skills to succeed either in college or in the increasingly technical job market.

Perhaps many of my colleagues noted as painfully as I did, the recent report of a Johns Hopkins professor who has launched a search for math "whiz kids" in China. While proficiency in mathematics is on the wane in the United States, this professor called China—by many standards a third world nation—the "major new source" of math talent in the world.

We should be deeply concerned by the declining number of our students who have the ability to or choose to seek advanced degrees in mathematics, the sciences, and engineering. A report by the National Research Council titled "Everybody Counts: A Report to the Nation on the Future of Mathematics Education", underscores the growing shortage of skilled mathematics in U.S. schools and industry. This report pointedly notes a level of student incompetence in math that is simply not tolerated in the schools of Japan and West Germany, two of our countrys' most pressing economic rivals.

This report plainly says we must reform mathematics education in the United States and that reforms must start in our elementary schools. If American children fail to acquire basic math skills in these early school years, they will not be prepared to master high school and college courses. Thus, these children, at a very early age, may have forfeited their ability to compete for the jobs of the future.

Another recent study, "A World of Difference," underscores this very disturbing fact and is a troubling predictor of math and science achievement levels by the young Americans who will enter the job market at the beginning of the next century. This report indicates that American 13-year-olds perform substantially behind their counterparts in many Asian nations. For example, South Korean youngsters perform four times better than American 13-year-olds. The percentage of Korean students who could use scientific procedures or analyze scientific data and draw appropriate conclusions nearly doubled that of their American counterparts.

One National Science Foundation official observing these results said:

The lack of preparation for further education and employment that these American teenagers demonstrated is nothing short of frightening.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, these studies show that we have a national crisis that demands our attention now. We must act to improve science and math education in America, starting in our elementary schools and reaching youngsters in groups that have shown little past success in this area.

It is critical that American elementary schoolchildren master the basic math skills so essential to their later success, yet compared to many other nations, we teach very little math and science in our elementary schools. It seems clear that we must take a critical look at our approach to teaching these subjects in elementary schools and be prepared to make whatever changes may be necessary to strengthen it. Perhaps all else depends on this.

Just as we are looking at what and how we are teaching, we must look at who we are teaching. Among our future teachers, scientists, and engineers must be members of groups who are particularly at risk in today's technologically oriented world; women and minorities who comprise a substantial part of America's work force.

Mr. Speaker, the phrase "a nation at risk" is no more accurately used than to describe the state of math and science education in America today. I have cited but two of many studies warning that our failure to prepare young Americans for leadership in mathematics and the sciences is to forfeit not only their futures but that of our Nation.

Reforming mathematics education in America must become a priority in this Congress and across the Nation and I urge my colleagues to join in this critical effort.

SALUTING THE BUSINESS LEAGUE OF BALTIMORE

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, on February 24, the Business League of Baltimore—a chapter of the National Business League—saluted the achievements of some of the city's most prominent business, political, and religious leaders at the Destination 21st Century Honors Banquet. The BLB is indeed one of the city's most venerable and well-respected civic organizations, and it is my pleasure to salute them here.

The BLB's roots stretch back to 1900, when its parent organization was founded by Booker T. Washington. The message was rich and—at the same time—simple. The economic destiny of Baltimore—or any other city—is shaped by the vision and purpose of those whose individual contributions serve to affect the whole. In other words, the future of a city depends upon the efforts of those who live in the present. BLB is committed to honoring those special Baltimoreans who are now laying in the foundations for a thriving and vital city of the future.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to honor such a forward-looking organization—one which rewards those men and women of vision which are often overlooked in today's society. My hat is off to those special individuals who shall receive the Business League of Baltimore's coveted award. However, it is also off to the BLB itself, for they have strived for a long time to make sure that Baltimore keeps becoming a better place. To them I send my heartiest thanks for a job well done.

REPRESENTATIVE BENNETT INTRODUCES B-2 STEALTH BOMBER BASIC INFORMATION BILL

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the late Bill Nichols, when chairman of the Armed Services Subcommittee on Investigations, said in a February 25, 1988 hearing on management of special access programs (HASC hearing No. 100-63, p. 1-2), "The investigation found that in other general program areas, special access programs enjoy many of the same problems as other so-called white programs. This seems to me to be a recipe for disaster. Instead of providing better-than-average oversight of special access programs, as is the intent of DOD regulations, it seems that as the number of dollars in these programs increases, oversight and review actually decrease. This is a totally unacceptable situation."

The reason I cite Mr. Nichols is to explain why I am introducing a bill today.

I am today introducing legislation to require that basic budget and program information concerning the B-2—Stealth, or Advanced Technology Bomber—be made publicly available in January 1990 unless the Secretary of Defense determines that doing so would pose a clear and immediate threat to U.S. national security. I invite my colleagues to join me as cosponsors of this bill.

I do not oppose the B-2 Program, and this is not what is called a killer bill. There is broad, bipartisan support for this program in Congress. But there is also a feeling that Congress and the public are entitled to some simple facts before they plunk down over $68 billion. This is especially true when funds for needed conventional weapons are being cut.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is entirely consistent with previous actions of the House Armed Services Committee on the B-2 Program. I hope that my bill will contribute to the continuing good work of the Armed Services Committee on this issue.

The House Armed Services Committee, under the leadership of LES ASPIN, has led the fight for more access to B-2 data for some years now. In June 1988 report "Acquiring Strategic Weapons: Are Working Nukes Just Flukes?", ASPIN said:

Turning to the B-2, we find a program that's been too highly classified for too long. The over classification has stifled the kind of technological crossfertilization that can help solve problems, and it has hurt oversight—two ills a program of this complexity does not need. . . . In preparing for this series of speeches, I asked the Department of Defense to declassify very limited information on schedule and cost. I was refused. That stubbornness may hurt this program in the long run.

ASPIN has led the House Committee in getting Congress to express concern in legislation. Section 1131 of Public Law 100-180, the fiscal year 1988 Defense Authorization Act, said:

It is the sense of Congress that . . . it would be consistent with the public interest and would not jeopardize the national security for the Secretary of Defense to disclose, in a nonclassified form, information about (the B-2 Advanced Technology Bomber) with respect to total program cost, the amount of the annual program budget request, a general description of program schedule.

In response to this legislation, only a single figure for total cost was ever revealed. It is now time to stop asking politely and demand program data in exchange for funding on a quid pro quo basis, consistent with national security.

I believe that releasing more information about the B-2 Program would actually be good for the continued survival of the program.

Release of basic program information is the best way for the B-2 Program to retain congressional support and allow the Air Force to refute speculating skeptics with hard facts. That is why I do not believe that this bill is truly controversial. Last year, Aviation Week and Space Technology magazine editorialized in favor of the basic concept now embodied in this bill. This very prestigious journal said in its April 25, 1988 editorial entitled "Declassifying the B-2":

The Air Force made hay with Congress last week by suddenly releasing an illustration of the supersecret B-2 bomber. Congressional leaders fell over each other lauding the disclosure, although they got little information from it. They were taken in by the element of surprise the Air Force exploited.

Until last week, the Air Force had stonewalled Congress with virtual impunity. Lawmakers, taken aback by the sudden about-face, played right into Air Force hands, giving the service the public relations coup it sought. But the service should beware. A mere illustration will not settle the declassification debate or the looming cost issue.

One can argue over how far the Air Force should go in declassifying the B-2, but one thing is certain—the program should be open enough to prevent the kind of serious mistakes made with the B-1B.

As Northrop and the Air Force prepare for the B-2's first flight this fall, they should consider the high expectations pervasive on Capitol Hill. Lowering these expectations to a sensible level and sharing data is the smart way to maintain congressional support, which will take a beating when the B-2's shakedown problems become public—in an austere fiscal climate.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues can join in this effort to see that the B-2 does not become another B-1B.

I attach the test of the bill, and a summary:

H.R. 1337

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. LIMITATION ON OBLIGATION OF FUNDS FOR ADVANCED TECHNOLOGY BOMBER PROGRAM.

(a) REAFFIRMATION OF 1987 CONGRESSIONAL FINDING.—Congress reaffirms its findings with respect to the Advanced Technology Bomber program expressed in section 1131 of Public Law 100-180.

(b) LIMITATION.—The Secretary of Defense shall advise Congress, in the manner specified in this section, of the status and planned schedule of events in the ATB program, including pertinent data about the program's budget and the mission projected to be fulfilled by the program. After the date on which the President submits to Congress the budget for fiscal year 1991 under section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, no funds may be obligated for procurement, for research, development, test, and evaluation, or for system-specific military construction for the B-2 Advanced Technology Bomber program until the Secretary of Defense submits to Congress a written report in unclassified form providing (subject to subsection (d)) the information specified in subsection (c) with respect to that program.

(c) INFORMATION TO BE PROVIDED.—The information referred to in subsection (b) to be provided in a report under that subsection is the following:

(1) A statement of the cost of Advanced Technology Bomber program, showing—

(A) the total program cost for the program (including system-specific military construction);

(B) the actual cost of the program for each fiscal year before fiscal year 1990, the estimated cost of the program for fsical year 1990, and the amount requested in the budget for the program by the President for fiscal year 1991; and

(C) for each such fiscal year, the amount for research, development, test, and evaluation, the amount for procurement, and the amount for system-specific military construction.

(2) A statement of the production schedule for the program by fiscal year—

(A) showing for each fiscal year before fiscal year 1991 the number of aircraft for which funds for procurement were authorized and the number of aircraft for which funds for procurement were appropriated, as well as the amounts of such funds for each such year; and

(B) showing for fiscal year 1991 the number of aircraft for which funds for procurement are requested by the President in the budget and the amount of funds requested for such procurement.

(3) A general description of the status of the test program for the B-2 aircraft, including a statement of the activities (to the date of the submission of the report) under the full performance matrix created pursuant to section 232(a) of Public Law 100-456 and section 121 of Public Law 100-180.

(4) The views of the Secretary of Defense on the missions and purposes of the Advanced Technology Bomber aircraft, including—

(A) a description of each intended mission of the B-2 aircraft, ranked by the relative importance of those missions for the program; and

(B) an explanation of why each of those missions is important to the national security strategy of the United States and why each such mission could not be fulfilled by other means.

(d) EXCEPTION FOR NATIONAL SECURITY.—If the Secretary of Defense determines (without delegation) that submitting in the report under subsection (b) a specific element of information described in any paragraph of subsection (c) in unclassified form would pose a clear and immediate threat to the national security interests of the United States, the Secretary may (in lieu of including that specific element of inforamtion in the report) include in the report a certification that the Secretary has made such a determination with respect to an element of information described in that specific paragraph. If a report under subsection (b) includes such a certification, the report shall include an explanation, in unclassified form, of the national security interests of the United States that would be threatened with respect to disclosure of each element of information with respect to which the Secretary makes such a certification.

SUMMARY OF PROVISIONS

Following is a summary of the four major provisions of the bill:

I. Reaffirmation of 1987 Congressional Finding.—The bill reaffirms the finding of Congress expressed in 1987 that it would be "consistent with public interest and would not jeopardize the national security for the Secretary of Defense to disclose, in nonclassified form" basic budget and program schedule information about the B-2 and two other systems. (P.L. 100-180, section 1131)

II. Funding Prohibition.—At the same time the President submits his fiscal year 1991 budget to Congress in January 1990, the Secretary of Defense must give Congress certain basic information about the B-2 program in unclassified form. No funds can be spent on the B-2 program after January 1990 unless this information is provided.

III. Required Information.—The bill requires information that would, in effect, answer the following questions:

How much will the B-2 program cost in total when completed?—(i.e., estimated total program cost, including R&D, procurement, and military construction).

How much money have we spent on the B-2 so far, and how much is requested?—(i.e., amounts spent on B-2 in previous and current years and amount requested for fiscal 1991; each year's amounts would be further broken down by R&D, procurement and military construction).

How many aircraft have we bought so far, and how many units are requested?—(i.e., quantity of aircraft authorized and appropriated in previous and current years, and quantity of aircraft requested for fiscal 1991).

How much flight testing of the B-2 has been done, and how are the tests going? How is B-2 doing under the test program mandated by Congress two years ago?—(i.e., general description of status of B-2 flight and field test program, including how it measures up under "performance matrix" required by previous defense bills at urging of House Armed Services Committee).

What are the missions of the B-2, and could they be achieved by other means?—(i.e. description of each intended mission, ranked by importance, along with explanation of why these missions are important to national security and why they could not be fulfilled by other means).

NOTE.—Nothing in the bill seeks public disclosure of information about radar-evading stealth features or any other technology secrets, which should remain highly classified to protect against Soviet espionage. The bill only asks for basic program data that would be useful to independent experts and to Congress during public debate on the issue.

IV. Exception for National Security.—If the Secretary of Defense himself determines that giving answers to any of these questions in unclassified form would pose a clear and immediate threat to national security, he may explain to Congress why he is not providing any such piece of information, provide Congress in unclassified form any information which does not endanger national security, and then proceed to spend funds on the B-2 program. The spending prohibition in No. 1 would not apply so long as he explains why he is withholding any piece of information for which he deems this action necessary.

TIME FOR INSURANCE REFORM

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the average American has worked from January 1 until today to pay his insurance bill—more than 2 months' salary is needed simply to pay for auto, health, life, and other insurance. In an increasingly complex society in which American families face greater and greater demands on their pocketbooks, insurance is one of the fastest growing basic costs.

Health insurance premiums have risen steadily, with no end in sight. Auto insurance premiums have jumped astronomically, if people can even find coverage. Liability insurance rates have increased several hundred percent for small businesses and nonprofit organizations.

During the last 2 years, the Commerce Subcommittee has examined this insurance crisis in depth. We have found motorists paying more for auto coverage than their cars are worth. We have found millions of Americans who cannot find long-term health care coverage or cannot afford it. We have found a pattern of insurers raising and cutting rates drastically and unpredictably, in response to changes in the investment climate that have nothing to do with insurance risks.

While each line of insurance has its own particular practices, there are fundamental deficiencies in how the insurance industry actually operates. One of the most fundamental deficiencies is the lack of competition.

One problem has come to light repeatedly: The entire insurance industry uses the same analysis and assumptions in setting rates. This practice, called "trending," is tantamount to price-fixing. It deprives consumers of meaningful choice, and also runs counter to prudent business sense. If all companies operate on one analysis and one set of assumptions, then the mistakes of one become the mistakes of all and the resulting erratic insurance cycle jeopardizes the financial soundness of the entire industry.

As a result of each hardening of the market, numerous insurers become insolvent. In recent years the number of insolvencies, and their size, has increased dramatically. Not only can insurance consumers not reliably anticipate insurance costs from one year to the next; they cannot even rely on the coverage they purchase to be there when they need it.

I have introduced legislation, H.R. 1093, the Insurance Consumer Protection Act, to protect consumers by setting basic standards for the business of insurance in interstate commerce, while preserving the State-based insurance regulatory system.

The bill prohibits insurance companies from jointly setting premiums, but permits them to continue jointly compiling statistics about actual past losses. The bill also prohibits other collusive actions which make insurance unavailable or unaffordable to American families, while preserving the freedom of individual insurers to decide which lines of insurance to offer and the geographical areas in which to offer them.

For those who choose to violate the law there will be tough sanctions— criminal penalties and treble damages.

Policyholders—whether it be auto insurance in California or New Jersey, or health insurance in New York or Washington, or casualty insurance in Texas or Ohio—should be confident that their bill is based on the independent judgment of their insurer. If they aren't satisfied, they should be able to change companies without simply getting a carbon copy of the first bill.

There has been much talk in the last few years about repealing the McCarran-Ferguson Act's exemption for insurers from the Federal antitrust laws. Insurance is the only industry with this broad exemption, and I see no reason why there should be a special exemption for one privileged industry from a basic commercial law that applies to every other industry.

Unfortunately, the McCarran-Ferguson antitrust exemption has a symbolic significance wholly apart from its effect. Because the McCarran-Ferguson Act also codifies the State-based system of insurance regulation, many have argued that modifying any part of McCarran-Ferguson will lead to Federal regulation of insurance. My bill allows us to avoid that debate.

Furthermore, my bill avoids the need to rely on litigation about which unfair and unsafe practices violate existing antitrust laws and whether there are special antitrust defenses which might apply. My bill specifies which practices are unfair and unsafe, and simply prohibits them.

The goal of H.R. 1093 is to bring the insurance system into the modern economy, protecting insurance consumers and providing them alternatives in a competitive market. We have witnessed insurance crisis after insurance crisis lately. This legislation will not solve all the problems that have led to those crises, but it will help establish an environment in which those problems can be solved.

H.R. 1250—PROTECT OUR CHILDREN FROM CIGARETTES ACT OF 1989

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. THOMAS A. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, too many of our children are becoming heavy smokers. The Surgeon General, in his recent report, told us that approximately 20 percent of high school seniors are daily smokers.

In his report last May, Dr. Koop told Congress that "careful examination of the data makes it clear that cigarettes and other forms of tobacco are addicting." He went on to say that "the processes that determine tobacco addiction are similar to those that determine addiction to drugs such as heroin and cocaine." Given this addictive property of cigarettes, it is not surprising that the Surgeon General found that over one-half of all smokers born since 1950 began smoking before reaching the age of 18.

This large incidence of smoking among our children is due, in large part, to the pervasiveness of cigarette advertising and promotions. The cigarette companies spend, according to the Federal Trade Commission, over $2 billion a year advertising and promoting cigarettes in this country, and the merchants of addiction are clearly very clever at what they are trying to do.

Most importantly, even movies contain cigarette advertisements. Philip Morris admitted in a letter of February 24 that in September 1988 its representative agreed to pay $350,000 on condition Lark cigarettes would be shown in a new James Bond movie under production. Payment was made to Danjaq, a company making the movie in this country and Mexico for showing around the world, including the United States. Lark is manufactured and marketed in an arrangement between Liggett and Philip Morris.

This new James Bond movie, originally called "License Revoked" and now called "Licensed to Kill," will be distributed throughout the world by United Artists this summer. In the movie Bond battles a Central American drug lord. The tragic irony here is that cigarettes, which kill 390,000 Americans each year, are being advertised in a movie in which Bond fights cocaine and heroin, which kill less than 5,000 Americans each year. Philip Morris also told me that in 1979 it paid $42,500 to have its Marlboro cigarette appear in the movie "Superman II."

Other cigarette companies have also told me that during the last decade they have either paid money or supplied such things as billboards to have a particular cigarette brand appear in a movie. For example, Liggett told me that in 1983 it paid $30,000 to have its Eve cigarette appear in the film "Supergirl."

This practice of paying money or providing valuable props to have a particular cigarette appear in a movie is an insidious technique by the merchants of addiction to get young people to smoke and also has the effect of circumventing the Federal ban, enacted in 1970, on cigarette advertising in television.

I have no desire to restrict in any way an artistic decision to include a smoking scene in a movie. But that decision should not be influenced by the lure of large cash payments from the tobacco companies, and the Protect Our Children from Cigarettes Act of 1989, H.R. 1250, would bar such payments.

The bill prohibits all tobacco product advertising and promotion that can be seen or heard by any person under the age of 18. However, the bill permits text only—that is, no pictures—advertisements to appear in newspapers, magazines, and other publications and on signs or billboards not located in a sports stadium or other sports facility.

Last May the Surgeon General asked, "With the evidence that tobacco is addicting, is it appropriate for tobacco products to be sold through vending machines, which are easily accessible to children?" I think the answer to that question must be "no," and the bill prohibits the sale of tobacco products from vending machines located in places where people under the age of 18 have access.

Finally, the bill directs the Federal Trade Commission to measure the amounts of various constituents of cigarette smoke, including tar, nicotine, carbon monoxide, ammonia, cyanide, formaldehyde, and radioactive compounds.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has bipartisan support. Mr. WHITTAKER, the ranking Republican on our subcommittee, is an original cosponsor. I urge my colleagues to support this bill so we can help protect our children from the siren song of the merchants of addiction.

NATIONAL DAY OF CONCERN FOR SUDAN, SUNDAY, MARCH 12

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States are responding with characteristic compassion to the terrible starvation that is now taking place in Sudan. As the dimensions of the civil war in Sudan and the dreadful suffering of Sudan's people become more widely known, the traditional American desire to provide assistance in the time of disaster has once again arisen. Under the leadership of Oxfam America and other private voluntary organizations, Sunday, March 12, has been declared a National Day of Concern for Sudan.

The goal of the National Day of Concern is to urge the U.S. Government to press for guaranteed safe passage of food to those in need and for a negotiated settlement. Its organizers hope to generate a million letters—one for every Sudanese who has died since 1983 due to war and famine. Prayer and moral persuasion must be brought to bear on a tragic situation in which the international traditions of humanitarian relief have been denied by the warring parties.

The civil war that wracks Sudan and the use of food as a weapon caused the deaths of 250,000 or more Sudanese last year. Most of these victims were children. Both the Government of Sudan and the rebel forces of the Sudanese People's Liberation Army have blocked food aid to those in need in this brutal war. Private agencies have been expelled by the Government and harassed by the rebels.

In testimony before a joint hearing of the House Select Committee on Hunger and the African Affairs Subcommittee of the Foreign Affairs Committee last week the Director of the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance stated that large quantities of food from the United States are available but cannot be delivered because safe passage cannot be guaranteed. It is critical that such an agreement be reached as soon as possible because the onset of the rainy season is only a few weeks off. At that point delivery of food assistance will be almost impossible because there are no passable roads. Thousands of lives will once more be imperiled.

With the support of many outstanding humanitarian leaders including Jack Healy, president of Amnesty International, and Father Theodore Hesburgh, president emeritus of Notre Dame University, Oxfam America has taken the lead in organizing the Day of Concern. It is appropriate that Americans respond because the Government of Sudan has been the major recipient of United States foreign assistance in Sub-Saharan Africa. It is time for the people of this country to indicate their belief that further aid and cooperation is untenable until there is meaningful action to alleviate the suffering of innocent people.

For months there was little evidence of pressure from Washington on the Government in Khartoum to move food assistance to civilians in areas under its control. There was no indication that further aid from the United States was contingent on getting relief to those in need. Last month for the first time the Secretary of State issued a statement deploring the situation in Sudan and calling for peace negotiations.

The Day of Concern for Sudan that will take place this Sunday supports this tentative action. It is a request by the people of the United States to their Government to take a more activist role as a broker in the peace process. This public demonstration is welcome and the leadership of Oxfam America is to be commended. The Day of Concern is an expression of our common humanity with the people of Sudan and a reminder that time is short.

TRIBUTE TO ROSEDALE BAPTIST CHURCH

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, last June I had the pleasure of celebrating a groundbreaking ceremony at the Rosedale Baptist Church. The church—though small in size—consists of one of the most wonderfully devoted pastors and congregations that I have ever seen. In fact, I was so impressed by the warmth and the genuine nature of these fine folks that I promised myself that I would return again on a visit one day.

Mr. Speaker, early this year I was able to keep this promise. On January 22 the Rosedale Baptist Church celebrated its silver anniversary as a thriving ministry and house of God. Though there are many churches which are superior in age, none could possibly be superior in message. There is no greater testament to this than the enthusiasm with which its members undertake the worship of God.

Members of the Rosedale Baptist Church are not content to sit silently in their pews and watch. Some teach Sunday School classes; some serve as church trustees; and some participate in the church's many programs to help the poor and the disadvantaged. Others give freely and generously to help the church grow and to meet its financial responsibilities. One very special lady by the name of Mrs. Iseloff donated a part of her own property to assist in the church's expansion.

The charity and selfless acts demonstrated by the people of this church and its pastor, Bob Polanowski, are indeed quite touching. They truly understand the importance of the American right to worship as one chooses. Last year I sponsored a bill which established a "Religious Freedom Week"—one which would hopefully boost our Nation's awareness of this precious constitutional prize. For the people at the Rosedale Baptists Church, however, such a week would seem to be almost unnecessary. Their celebration of religious freedom is a year-long event.

To Pastor Polanowski and all the rest of you fine people: best wishes on the occasion of your 25th anniversary and kudos for a job well done.

BUDGET CRISIS OF THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the veterans of our Nation. The Veterans' Administration is facing a budget crisis which requires our immediate attention. Our Nation's veterans acknowledge the great need to reduce the Federal budget deficit and to pursue greater efficiency in every program. But the glaring fact remains that it is a national disgrace that our Nation spends billions in every corner of the globe and billions more on wasteful domestic projects, while drastically underfunding what should be our first priority—our commitments to our vets.

Unfortunately, the Bush administration's current budget proposal does not even begin to address the serious problems facing our veterans, especially for health care services. This spending plan falls far short of adequately addressing the needs of the veterans of our Nation. We are forced to face the fact that budget funding at the proposed level will lead to a continued deterioration of many vital services. Without proper funding, Veterans' Administration health facilities across the Nation will have to continue turning patients away, cutting back on medications, curtailing beneficiary travel, and putting off surgery until a later date. I am afraid that if the current situation prevails, many of our VA hospitals in this Nation are going to fall into a funding black hole—administrators are forced to steal from their maintenance and operation funds in order to make their payrolls to what is already a bare bones staff. Where will this leave us in 3 to 5 years when our physical plant is already aging? I am afraid I know, and I don't like what I see.

Veterans health care is being eliminated and curtailed in every area due to this funding shortfall. Perhaps the Office of Management and Budget hopes to develop a Veterans' Administration greatly circumscribed in scope; one built on smoke and mirrors emanating from unrealistic projections, followed by cuts made on these projections and ending up with further unrealistic projections the following year based on the results of their own false assumptions. How can we have a budget which does not reflect the fact that our veteran population is aging rapidly? The administration has not called for any new nursing home construction despite the fact that two-thirds of the male population will be veterans age 65 and older at the turn of the century. If we allow this cycle of unrealistic assumptions and projections to continue, we will end up with a Veterans' Administration that does not meet congressionally mandated responsibilities. I believe that we must take a stand now to reverse these tragically misdirected policies.

The VA hospitals in my district, which comprises the entire State of South Dakota, are facing similar problems to those of the other hospitals in the Nation; that is, they are undergoing a funding and health care crisis. Furthermore, these hospitals are looking to us, here in Congress, to lead the way in increasing their budgets so that they can restore vital services which these hospitals can no longer provide. All the hospitals in my district have stated that if additional funding is not forthcoming, they would have to resort to drastic measures; this is a prospect they did not even want to consider in light of the fact that service to category B and C patients has already either been completely eliminated or curtailed, wards have been closed down, and stabilized patients of all categories have been terminated.

The hospital in Sioux Falls has already been forced to close down a ward—40 beds—because of insufficient funds. All the hospitals listed the likelihood of terminating personnel next year despite the fact that they are already at their minimum staff size for safety. These cuts would go beyond those already being made by attrition. In addition, maintenance and operations would continue to be curtailed in order to meet basic health needs. Currently the hospital in Sioux Falls is forced to prescribe cheaper, alternative drugs, as opposed to the more expensive drug which would often be the first choice of the attending physician, due to budgetary considerations. If budgetary trends continue, medications will unfortunately be one of the first programs targeted for cuts due to its expense. At the same time, waiting lists for certain surgical procedures, such as for cataracts, grow longer and longer, forcing the veteran to wait and suffer. Those requiring prosthetics and wheelchairs also face a long, discouraging waiting list. Furthermore, the Outreach Program and beneficiary travel benefits would also suffer under the current budget proposal. These programs allow veterans from Iowa, Nebraska, Wyoming, and Montana, as well as distant parts of the State of South Dakota to receive health care. Remove these programs and you remove health care for thousands in this region.

South Dakota is a medically underserved State. For that reason, the cutbacks in discretionary care and the proposed future cutbacks, hit the State inordinately hard. VA hospitals are a primary source for care. Many rural communities lack any health facilities whatsoever, while the facilities in other communities are inadequate to deal with many medical problems and emergencies. Numerous veterans in the region think nothing of traveling 100 or 150 miles to receive care in a VA hospital. Where are they to go when beneficiary travel or the services they need are eliminated? VA hospitals have a tradition in South Dakota of providing quality care to a wide, multistate population which has few health care alternatives. Beyond that, these hospitals have long proved a top training ground for the young doctors of our Nation. If budgetary problems continue, important staff positions could either be cut or the Administrator would lack the funds to attract more than a bare handful. The Veterans' Administration health care facilities and services are vital to the health care network in South Dakota, and while the current cutbacks have already caused suffering, further cuts would be devastating.

VA hospitals and health care is vital to the veterans of this Nation. We promised to take care of the vets in our Nation's time of need, and now that it is their time of need, we need to remember our sacred commitments and keep them. Congress must live up to the promises that the Federal Government made, whether explicitly or implicitly, to the veterans. I urge my colleagues to support the Veterans' Affairs Committee recommendation for a $432 million supplemental for fiscal year 1989 and an additional $1.3 billion for the VA in fiscal year 1990. These figures are the minimum needed to retain veterans health care as we know it today. If additional funds are not forthcoming, we will face the tragic reality of radical changes, such as the closures of vital veterans' hospitals. We must find the funding to avert this potential health care disaster, and then work together to find the funding to restore services to the levels that the veterans of this Nation deserve.

COMMITTEE PROCESS REFORMS

HON. LYNN MARTIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Committee Process Reforms of 1989, a package of 14 House rules amendments aimed at revitalizing our committee system.

The acronym for committee process reform is CPR, and that's just what our committee system needs—a little cardiopulmonary resuscitation. Committees are supposed to comprise the very heart of the legislative process, and yet today they are suffering from hardened arteries, clogged valves, and tangled veins.

Committees and Members are overwhelmed by too many subcommittees, too much staff, and jurisdictional overlaps and conflicts. It's little wonder that committees must resort to one-third quorums and ghost voting to get things done. And it's little wonder that committees failed to reauthorize one-third of expired laws last year totaling $23 billion.

My package of reforms would put us back on the right track by limiting committees to no more than 6 subcommittees, Members to no more than 4 subcommittee assignments, and by reducing staff by 10 percent. Moreover, it would abolish joint bill referrals and proxy voting, and restore majority quorums and open meetings. My resolution would further restore the May 15 reporting deadline for authorizations and require more systematic oversight. Finally, I would require a two-thirds vote to consider any rule which makes in order an unreported bill. Let's administer CPR now before the heart of the House, our committee system, becomes a useless organ.

A summary of the resolution follows:

H. RES. 106

SUMMARY OF "COMMITTEE PROCESS REFORMS OF 1989"

(A resolution introduced by Representative LYNN MARTIN to amend House rules "to restore the committee system to its rightful role in the legislative process")

Sec. 1. Title: "Committee Process Reforms of 1989."

Sec. 2. (a) House Rules would be amended as follows:

(1) Oversight Reform.—Committees would be required to formally adopt and submit to the House Administration Committee by March 1st of the first session their oversight plans for that Congress. The House Administration Committee, after consultation with the majority and minority leaders, would report the plans to the House by March 15th together with its recommendations, and those of the joint leadership group to assure coordination between committees. The Speaker would be authorized to appoint ad hoc oversight committees for specific tasks from the membership of committees with shared jurisdiction. Committees would be required to include an oversight section in their final activity report at the end of a Congress.

(2) Multiple Referral of Legislation.—The joint referral of bills to two or more committees would be abolished, while split and sequential referrals would be retained, subject to time limits and designation by the Speaker of a committee of principal jurisdiction.

(3) Committee Elections and Organization.—Committees would be elected not later than seven legislative days after the convening of a new Congress and must organize not later than three legislative days thereafter.

(4) Committee Ratios.—The party ratios on committees would be required to reflect that of the full House (except for Standards of Official Conduct which is bipartisan). The requirement would extend to select and conference committees as well.

(5) Subcommittee Limits.—No committee (except appropriations) could have more than six subcommittees, and no Member could have more than four subcommittee assignments.

(6) Proxy Voting Ban.—All proxy voting on committees would be prohibited.

(7) Open Meetings.—Committee meetings could only be closed by majority vote for national security, personal privacy, or personnel reasons.

(8) Majority Quorums.—A majority of the membership of a committee would be required for the transaction of any business.

(9) Report Accountability.—The names of those voting for and against reporting measures shall be included in the committee report, and, if a measure is reported on a nonrecorded vote, the names of those members actually present shall instead be listed in the committee report.

(10) Prior Availability of Draft Report.—A draft committee report must be made available to members at least one legislative day prior to its consideration.

(11) Committee Documents.—Committee documents intended for public dissemination, other than factual materials, must either be voted on by the committee and opportunity afforded for additional views, or must carry a disclaimer on their cover that they have not been approved by the committee and do not necessarily reflect the views of its members.

(12) Unreported Bills.—It would not be in order, except by two-thirds vote, to consider a rule in the House on a bill that has not been reported from committee.

(13) Committee Staffing.—Committee funding resolutions could not be considered until the House has first adopted a resolution from the House Administration Committee setting an overall limit on committee staffing for the session. The minority would be entitled to up to one-third of the investigative staff funds, on request. The overall committee staff limit for the 101st Congress could not be more than 90% of the total at the end of the 100th Congress.

(14) Authorization Reporting Deadline.—Committees would be required to report authorization bills not later than May 15 preceding the beginning of the fiscal year to which they apply.

(b) Effective Date.—The provisions of the resolution shall take effect upon adoption, so far as they are applicable.

THE VIRGIN ISLANDS REUNIFICATION ACT

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, this morning I am introducing The Virgin Islands Reunification Act, a bill that will enable the U.S. Government to correct a long-standing problem in the U.S. Virgin Islands.

This bill will truly unite the Virgin Islands because it will bring Water Island, our fourth largest island, into our local community after a 40-year lapse. It will correct the inequities that have developed while Water Island has been under Federal ownership, when it has been an isolated Federal enclave right in the middle of St. Thomas Harbor. Under Federal ownership, this beautiful island, just a stone's throw from shore, has been out of reach for local people.

My legislation is intended to unite the Virgin Islands in a way that respects the authority of our local government to control development of Water Island, enables Water Island homeowners to gain the security of buying the property under their own homes for a fair price, opens up home-ownership opportunities for other Virgin Islanders, and preserves needed green space.

Mr. Speaker, I call this a 40-year old problem because it dates back to World War II. At that time, the Federal Government acquired several prominent pieces of property in the Virgin Islands for military purposes. When the military emergency was over, the Federal Government gradually turned these lands over to the territory.

But there was one major exception—Water Island. The Federal Government offered it to a private developer, under a highly favorable lease, to build a resort that would advance the economic development of the entire territory, but that never happened. Instead, the masterleaseholder built a small resort, then concentrated on developing an exclusive residential area. While the Virgin Islands has gradually gained autonomy and control of its lands in the last 40 years, Water Island has remained a symbol of an earlier time when the U.S. Government ruled the Virgin Islands virtually as a colonial power. In 1972, the first lease was renewed, despite the strong opposition of Virgin Islands officials. The second lease is due to expire in 1992.

My bill will correct this inequity once and for all before that expiration date in 1992. My legislation is very simple. It requires the Federal Government to turn Water Island over to the Virgin Islands Government, and it requires the Virgin Islands Governor, with the approval of the Virgin Islands legislature, to develop a detailed plan for the use of the island, which must then be submitted to Congress for review.

This procedure will enable everyone involved in this issue to have a voice in the ultimate plan for Water Island. The Governor's plan will have to accommodate many different interests—those of the people of the Virgin Islands, those of the residents of Water Island who have built their homes without owning the land on which they sit, and those of the master-leaseholder, who has built a resort there.

The Governor will be assisted in this task by the voluminous public record that we have established in Congress on this issue. We have compiled recommendations and reports from the Department of Interior. The full Interior and Insular Affairs Committee held hearings on this subject in 1985. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Insular and International Affairs, I chaired four more hearings in 1987, including two hearings on St. Thomas in November 1987. We have heard from everyone who is involved and will be affected. We have set the scene for finding the formula that will balance all these interests in a fair manner.

After this exhaustive review, the time has arrived for legislation to correct the situation. My bill offers a solution that recognizes the right of the Virgin Islands Government to control property under its jurisdiction, while offering fair treatment to everyone involved in this complex problem.

PROTECTION AGAINST PORNOGRAPHIC ADVERTISEMENTS

HON. WAYNE OWENS

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I introduced legislation to address the intolerable problem of unsolicited, pornographic advertisements being sent through the U.S. mail. I have received numerous complaints from the citizens of my district who have received explicit, insulting advertisements offering X-rated videos. They are offended and they are angry.

Itself an example of the pornography that plagues this country, these advertisements were sent out on a bulk mail permit. No one but the publisher knows how many homes received this unwelcome advertisement, or how the names and addresses were obtained. I do know that it was unsolicited. My constituents were outraged to have their homes invaded and their children unnecessarily exposed to pornographic advertising which was delivered through the U.S. mail.

To combat this problem, my bill would allow an individual upon receiving sexually explicit material, to make a request through the postal service to order the sender to disclose the source from which their name and address was obtained. Should the sender fail to comply, the postal service can seek a court order mandating compliance. Failure to comply would be punishable as contempt of court.

My legislation will help force magazine publishers to use greater discretion in selling their lists, a common practice in today's world of direct mail advertising. If a postal patron is easily able to determine that the publisher of his or her favorite magazine sold their list to a pornographer, perhaps reputable publishers will not sell their lists so indiscriminately. This bill will offer millions of families added protection against pornography, in our fight to eliminate this cancer that is spreading throughout our Nation.

ARMS CONTROL IN EUROPE: A NEW BEGINNING

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, today marks the opening of the NATO-Warsaw Pact negotiations on conventional arms forces in Europe [CFE]. The challenge facing the 23 nations involved in these talks will be to limit their nonnuclear ground forces in Europe from the Atlantic to the Urals and to eliminate the asymmetries between NATO and the Warsaw Pact so that no country will have to live under the threat of a massive offensive attack. These talks will be taking place simultaneously in the same building in Vienna as the followup to the 35-nation Stockholm talks on furthering confidence and security building measures [CSBM's] in Europe.

At first glance, it appears that the NATO and Warsaw Pact positions at the CFE talks are closer in many respects than one might have expected. The reduction in numbers is similar, there is agreement on the concept of equal collective ceilings, the Soviet Union accepts the fact that they will have to implement asymmetrical reductions and they have accepted the West's insistence on stringent verification provisions. This is an excellent beginning.

At the same time, much has been written about the fate of these talks, that is the daunting obstacles in the way of agreement, ranging from data disagreements to verification problems to questions about the inclusion of aircraft and naval forces, and so forth.

These problems are real. As these negotiations are bound to take a considerable amount of time, we must be prepared to take advantage of the opportunities that may arise during the talks to meet and build off the common areas of agreement to meet our objectives. This means that we should be open to the possibility of interim agreements or a series of agreements. As outlined in the mandate to the CFE talks, the objectives of the talks are:

To strengthen stability and security in Europe through the establishment of a stable and secure balance of conventional armed forces, which include conventional armaments and equipment, at lower levels; the elimination of disparities prejudicial to stability and security; and the elimination, as a matter of priority, of the capability for launching surprise attack and for initiating large-scale offensive action.

The Soviet Union has made bold unilateral proposals for conventional reductions outside of the framework of the CFR talks. They are bold in their unilateral nature, but, more importantly, they are bold in that General Secretary Gorbachev announced that at the end of the period of unilateral reductions, the structure of Soviet forces will be different—that is, defensively oriented—in effect acknowledging the current offensive nature of Soviet forces. As a test of Soviet seriousness and interest in conventional stability, it will be important to watch closely how Gorbachev implements his unilateral reductions and if Soviet forces do become, in fact, defensively restructured.

In his speech before the United Nations General Assembly on December 7, 1988, General Secretary Gorbachev announced the Soviet Union's unilateral reductions. He stated that the Soviet Union would:

By the end of 1990 reduce the numerous strength of its armed forces by 500,000 men—this would involve a reduction of troops in Eastern Europe, internally and in Asia; withdraw and disband six tank divisions from East Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary by the end of 1990; withdraw assault landing troops and other offensive oriented forces from Eastern Europe; reduce Soviet East European forces by 50,000 men and 5,000 tanks; restructure forces remaining in Eastern Europe toward a defensive structure; cut Soviet forces in the Atlantic to the Urals area by a total of 10,000 tanks, 8,500 artillery systems, and 800 combat aircraft; and reduce significantly Soviet forces in Mongolia.

In the mandate to the CFE talks, only the conventional aspect of dual capable systems is included. NATO and the Warsaw Pact also agreed in the mandate to specifically exclude nuclear weapons, naval forces and chemical weapons from the negotiations. However, the Soviet Union continues to press for including naval forces in the talks. While aircraft are not specifically excluded from the mandate, NATO is not addressing them at this time, while the Soviets are pressing to include them.

While the NATO proposal continues to evolve, their position at the opening of the CFE talks includes the following elements:

Reductions in key categories of weapons—tanks, artillery pieces and armored troop carriers to 5 to 10 percent below current NATO levels. This would result in the following limits: Tanks: A 40,000 overall limit in Europe—20,000 for NATO and 20,000 for the Warsaw Pact; artillery pieces: a 33,000 overall limit—16,500 for NATO and 16,500 for the Warsaw Pact; and armored troop carriers: 56,000 overall limit—28,000 for NATO and 28,000 for the Warsaw Pact.

No country could possess more than 30 percent of the total holdings in Europe. This would result in the following limits; Tanks: No country could have more than 12,000—the Soviet Union now has about 37,000 tanks; artillery pieces: no country could have more than 10,000; and armored troop carriers: no country could have more than 16,800; special limits on forces stationed on other countries' territories in order to limit Soviet forces in Eastern Europe.

Measures for stability and verification to include: Transparency, notification and constraint applied to the deployment, movement, storage and levels of readiness of conventional armed forces—armaments and equipment; and exchanges of data about forces and deployments, with the right to conduct onsite inspection.

In the longer term, NATO would be willing to look at further steps to enhance stability and security in Europe, including further reductions of conventional armaments or equipment and the restructuring of armed forces to a defensive orientation.

Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze outlined the Warsaw Pact's opening position at the CFE talks in a speech he made in Vienna on Monday. The Soviet proposal includes the following elements:

First stage: Equal ceilings on key categories of weapons—tactical fighter aircraft, tanks, combat helicopters, armored personnel carriers, artillery, multiple rocket launchers, and mortars—to 10 to 15 percent below the lowest levels currently possessed by either side, to be implemented over a period of 2 or 3 years.

Second stage: Troop levels and weapons systems would be reduced by 25 percent more over another 2 or 3 year period.

Final stage: NATO and Warsaw Pact forces would be restructured to have a defensive character and agreements would be reached on ceilings limiting all other categories of arms; and in the area of verification, Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze announced Soviet acceptance of stringent and rigorous verification, including inspections, without the right of refusal.

Let me reiterate that we have an excellent beginning and opportunity before us to achieve conventional stability in Europe. The West needs to explore specific measures to defensively restructure forces in Europe and in this connection we must be prepared at some point to address certain categories of NATO and Warsaw Pact aircraft.

A subject that I have not yet touched on is the very important and potentially confrontational one of the short-range nuclear forces [SNF], the tactical nuclear weapons in Europe.

With the successful implementation of the INF Treaty, attention is turning toward the CFR talks, but also to tactical nuclear weapons. The debate will tend to focus on whether or not to modernize the followon to the LANCE short-range surface-to-surface missile.

Modernization of the Lance and other SNF systems should not be a fait accompli. A thorough review of a variety of options, not all nuclear, should take place in the official and public domain before decisions are made which may provoke controversy. First, there needs to be an intensive examination within NATO and in the Congress to assess the need for such weapons and whether or not they contribute to NATO's flexible response policy.

NATO is in the process of developing a comprehensive concept of arms control and disarmament that would examine NATO's approach to a number of conventional, strategic, and chemical issues, including NATO's SNF po...y.

Other questions that need to be addressed include: What is the deterrence value of SNF weapons today? Are these weapons and their modernization in NATO's interest? Or, do they move us in the wrong direction—away from the arms control track enhanced by the implementation of the INF Treaty? How do we best ensure further stabilizing arms control reductions in Europe? And how should this be balanced with modernization concerns? Moreover, if Gorbachev backs up his conventional pronouncements with implementation of asymmetrical reductions, then NATO could look more realistically at a reduced need for SNF—perhaps even elimination.

In his speech on Monday, Shevardnadze proposed separate negotiations on eliminating short-range nuclear weapons in Europe. This administration currently opposes such negotiations. It is my recommendation that we look seriously at how we are going to address the SNF question. NATO must look at SNF and its integration into NATO strategy. We may have to modify our negative answer at some point.

Given the importance of our relations with our allies, the need to have a united NATO position on a number of issues, and the wisdom of taking advantage of the new thinking and the changes evolving in the Soviet Union, I am announcing a series of hearings on "Arms Control in Europe," with a particular emphasis on NATO strategy, SNF arms control, and modernization concerns. The Subcommittee on Arms Control, International Security, and Science plans to begin these hearings in April.

As I have done with the Geneva arms control talks, I also plan to keep committee members involved in the CRE process by providing briefings on a regular basis.

A TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE FRED J. BORCHARD

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Honorable Fred J. Borchard, who has retired after 43 years of dedicated service to the people of Saginaw County and the State of Michigan. We certainly wish Judge Borchard all the best in the many years to come.

I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues some information about a truly outstanding individual. Judge Borchard graduated from Arthur Hill High School in 1932, where he was active athletically and excelled academically. In addition to the time he spent in school, Judge Borchard held part-time jobs in the afternoons and in the summer. His perseverance was also evident in this academic life. He graduated from Bay City Junior College and went on to finish his higher education at the University of Michigan in a pre-law curriculum. He then stayed on at the University of Michigan to receive his law degree.

Upon admission to the Michigan Bar, attorney Borchard felt his presence necessary in our war effort. He joined the U.S. Naval Reserve and eventually saw action at Okinawa where he was wounded by enemy fire. He was then transferred to Pearl Harbor and was decorated with the Purple Heart.

In 1945, as a young aspiring attorney, Mr. Borchard returned to Saginaw and began his practice of law. In 1947 he was elected as municipal judge and after 5 years, he ran for probate judge in 1952. After a successful campaign, Judge Borchard served on the probate bench until Governor G. Mennen Williams appointed him to a newly created circuit court vacancy. Until his retirement this year, Judge Borchard has served on the circuit court bench since 1958. Needless to say, Judge Borchard has one of the longest tenures as a judge in the history of Michigan.

Over the years, Judge Borchard has become recognized as a judge of fairness and order. His dedication to the judiciary and his knowledge of the law is widely known and his courtroom holds a reputation of renowned dignity.

Judge Borchard has made his contribution to Saginaw not only through his tenure as judge, but also through his own personal commitment to the betterment of his community. He is past president of the University of Michigan Club, Germania of Saginaw, the Kiwanis Club of Saginaw, and the Arthur Hill Letterman's Club. He served on the Board of Director's of St. Luke's Hospital, the Saginaw County Chamber of Commerce, the Alcohol Information Center, Big Brothers, and the Lutheran Children's Friends Society. Indeed, Judge Borchard has made his mark on Saginaw.

It is with deep appreciation that we recognize the Honorable Fred J. Borchard. Not many people come along and make such a sincere and meaningful contribution to a community. We wish Judge Borchard and his wife Helen many years of happiness and good fortune.

20TH CONGRESS OF THE INTERNATIONAL POSTAL UNION

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in saluting the U.S. Postal Service for hosting the 20th Congress of the Universal Postal Union [UPU].

The last time the UPU met in the United States was in 1897, when 55 member nations were represented. The 1989 meeting of the UPU anticipates that some 200 nations and territories will be represented. By tradition, the postal administration of the host country plans and manages the international Congress.

The next meeting of the Universal Postal Union will take place November 13 through December 15, 1989, at the Washington Convention Center in Washington, DC.

Nearly all of the world's postal administrations belong to the Univeral Postal Union, a specialized agency of the United Nations. The UPU's 169 members comprise a single postal territory where another country's mailing is afforded the same careful treatment as domestic mail.

In conjunction with the UPU's meeting, the first international stamp show directly sponsored by the U.S. Postal Service [World Stamp Expo '89] will take place from November 17 through December 3, 1989. The 14-day exhibition will be divided into four segments: "Mail Delivery of the Past," "Mail Delivery of the Future," "Postal Stationery," and a "Youth Fiesta."

The U.S. Postal Service has graciously offered to provide the U.S. Congress with a booth to display its Bicentennial Exhibit and has authorized the Capitol Hill Philatelic Club to provide Members of Congress, their families and staff with tickets in order to see the congressional exhibit at the Convention Center.

I commend the U.S. Postal Service and those associated with hosting World Stamp Expo '89 for the whole world to see and enjoy, and I urge my colleagues to join me in expressing appreciation and offering their support.

THE RADON GAS TAX RELIEF ACT

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing the Radon Gas Tax Relief Act.

Fueled by last September's joint health advisory by the Surgeon General's office and the EPA, radon has become a great concern to the American public.

The statistics are alarming. We know that randon gas is a health hazard: EPA estimates that some 20,000 Americans die each year of radon-induced lung cancer. We also know that many of these deaths can be prevented. Relatively simple building techniques can bring radon gas down to safe levels in homes and buildings.

Unfortunately, the cost of these techniques can be prohibitive. Currently, it usually costs anywhere from $500, to $1,000 to install radon mitigation equipment in homes. Low to middle income families have an especially hard time bearing these costs.

The Radon Gas Tax Relief Act provides a series of tax credits and deductions for homeowners, builders, and developers who install equipment to control radon gas. It makes radon mitigation more accessible to tightly budgeted families and also encourages builders to start equipping new homes and buildings to control radon gas.

Our priority should be to reduce the unsafe levels of radon gas in as many homes and buildings as possible. My bill is a step in that direction. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the bill.

CLARIFYING THE RECORD

HON. JERRY F. COSTELLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I want to announce that on Monday, February 6, I was conducting congressional business in my district and was unable to vote in the House on the procedural motion to adjourn. Had I been present, I would have voted not to adjourn.

On Friday, February 3, I contacted the House leadership about the possibility of legislative votes on February 6, and was assured there would be none. Indeed, there were no votes on legislative matters until Tuesday, February 7, when I joined a majority of my colleagues in rejecting the pay increase recommendations included in President Reagan's fiscal year 1990 budget.

I state these matters only as a matter of clarification and thank the Speaker for delaying any legislative vote until the next day, allowing those Members predominantly from Midwestern and Western areas of the country time to travel to Washington and vote on this important proposal.

A NEW ERA FOR FAIR HOUSING

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, March 12, marks the effective date of the Fair Housing Amendment Act of 1988. The commencement of this new law marks a historic new chapter in America's civil rights history.

Although the Congress enacted the original Fair Housing Act in 1968, this law lacked an effective enforcement mechanism. Unlike other civil rights laws, the Federal Government had little role in enforcing the law, but rather the burden was placed on private persons and the States. The new law creates an expedited administrative enforcement procedure to adjudicate fair housing complaints. Under this new procedure, the Federal Government will be a leader in enforcing the fair housing laws.

The new law also adds protections for the handicapped and families with children. During the course of our deliberations on the bill, we found disturbing levels of discrimination against both of these groups. The new law guarantees that the handicapped and families will no longer be turned away from housing on the basis of their status.

Passage of the Fair Housing Amendments Act came only after a 10-year effort. Although the House passed a similar bill in 1980, the bill did not pass in the Senate. I want to thank all of the Members who played major roles in this battle, but particularly two former members: Father Robert Drinan, who was my cosponsor of the successful 1980 House bill, and Senator Charles Mathias, who was its Senate champion for so many years.

In the successful enactment in the 100th Congress, my good friend Hamilton Fish, Jr., the author of the bill, forged the historic compromise that insured enactment, and Senators EDWARD M. KENNEDY and ARLEN SPECTER masterfully guided the bill through the Senate.

I look forward to the day when our Nation no longer needs laws like the Fair Housing Act, when discrimination no longer occurs in American society. But until then, aggressive enforcement of effective fair housing laws will make America a better nation for all.

JOHN DINGELL HONORED FOR NEPA

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last night, the Environmental and Energy Study Institute hosted a dinner to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the National Environmental Policy Act and to honor the dean of the Michigan delegation, Mr. DINGELL, for his instrumental role in passage of that landmark law.

I had the privilege to serve as the master of ceremonies for the dinner, along with dinner co-chairs, the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LENT], and an honorary dinner committee made up of the House Democratic leadership and members of the Energy and Commerce Committee and the Michigan Delegation.

Twenty years ago this year, JOHN DINGELL, then a seven-term Congressman chairing the Fish and Wildlife Subcommittee, led the effort in the House of Representatives to pass the National Environmental Policy Act—the first of the current generation of national environmental laws.

JOHN DINGELL said on the floor of the House in 1969 that passage of the National Environmental Policy Act "will constitute one of the most significant steps ever taken in the field of conservation." And he was right. NEPA set the stage for passage of a long list of other landmark laws in the 1970's—the Clean Air Act of 1970, the Clean Water Act of 1972, the Endangered Species Act of 1973, the Safe Drinking Water Act of 1974, and the Toxic Substance Control Act of 1976. And JOHN played an influential role in the passage of all of these laws and many others coming out of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

NEPA, though only five pages long, has had a much more far-reaching impact than many of the bills we now pass that are hundreds of pages long. It has dramatically transformed the way we in Government and the private sector and the average citizen of this country think about and carry out our daily business. The revolutionary notion that JOHN DINGELL had that we ought to think about the environmental consequences of our actions is not part of the fabric of our society.

The early years following passage of NEPA were not easy. NEPA, and its environmental impact statement requirement, were attacked for blocking development, jobs, energy production, and everything else under the sun. But JOHN DINGELL fought off every attack, and it survived, and thrived.

Think about how times have changed. The attacks on NEPA were based on the promise that protecting the environment conflicted with economic development. Now, 20 years later, it is clear just how wrong that premise was. In fact, it is increasingly clear that we cannot have economic growth without sound environmental stewardship, and that we can't protect the environment without economic development. This is most apparent in the developing world, where millions of people are destroying their forests and lands in a desperate struggle to feed themselves, and in the process destroying their very ability to survive. Now, I think we in this country and elsewhere in the developed world are beginning to see that economic growth and environmental protection go hand in hand, and that a failure to protect the environment—to protect the ozone layer, to stem ocean pollution, to prevent global warming—will doom our changes for sustained growth and threaten the planet's survival.

On behalf of my colleagues, I want to extend my appreciation to JOHN DINGELL for his leadership and vision in passing NEPA.

The proceeds from the dinner will be used by the Institute for a unique program to activate new congressional leadership on important emerging issues, including global climate change, rural groundwater contamination, energy policy, and solid waste management.

A PIONEER IN WOMEN'S HISTORY

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, this month has been designated as "National Women's History Month." I rise in tribute to a pioneer woman physician and supporter of the women's rights movement of the late 1800's. Mr. Speaker, I am referring to Dr. Mary Edwards Walker.

Dr. Walker is the only woman ever to receive the Medal of Honor, the highest military award given by the U.S. Government, for her courageous and tireless service during the Civil War as the Union Army's first commissioned female surgeon. Denied a surgeon's contract, she was forced to serve as a nurse for the first 3 years of her service. Nevertheless, she voluntarily ventured past Union lines to provide medical attention to the nearby civilian population, responding when no man was willing for fear of being captured by the Confederate Army. As a result of that courage, she was captured and spent 4 months in a Confederate prison.

President Andrew Johnson, in 1865, awarded Dr. Walker the Medal of Honor for her indefatigable care of the sick and wounded and for the hardship she endured as a prisoner of war.

At the age of 83, Dr. Walker's medal was withdrawn by a Government review board along with 900 other veterans claiming that they had been improperly awarded. In Dr. Walker's case, it was a question of her status as a member of the Army or a contract doctor. Although she did not live to see it, her medal was restored by the Army in 1977.

Dr. Walker believed it was every woman's right to vote and campaigned for that right as a member of a dedicated band of suffragettes. She also helped to lead a movement aimed at ending the social restrictions on the way women dressed. Her opinions on the women's attire of her day are expressed in two books, "Hit" (1871) and "Unmasked; or the Science of Immorality" (1878). Strongly believing it was a woman's right to dress as she desired, Dr. Walker was infamous for wearing trousers—something unheard of during her lifetime.

Mr. Speaker, I salute a pioneer of women's history and a woman who has profoundly affected the lives of many.

SILVER BULLION IMPORT FEE

HON. RICHARD H. STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, today, I have introduced legislation, as I did in the 100th Congress, to establish an import fee on silver bullion.

I have taken this action because I am most concerned about the prospects for long-term stability for domestic silver manufacturers. As you know, the silver industry has historically been a major employer for thousands of Idahoans.

But now, that once vibrant industry remains depressed and silver prices continue to languish at approximately $5.75 an ounce, a price significantly less than the cost of production. In my own congressional district, the Clayton Silver Mine remains on a sorry standby basis.

Simply, my bill calls for a fee equal to the difference between the average monthly price for the month immediately preceding the date of the first sale within the United States of silver bullion and $7.50 per ounce.

The legislation exempts the first 6.5 million ounces of silver sold and imported into the country during any calendar month, an amount equivalent to the 1980 import level.

Mr. Speaker, today we see copper, zinc, and lead all at record prices. Because of the continued influx of imports, however, silver remains dramatically depressed. All that our producers are asking for is a level playing field, and I strongly believe that my bill will help provide that market condition.

In conclusion, let me point out that my concern is for an industry which, since 1980, has seen imports grow from 79 million ounces to as much as 180 million ounces annually, an increase of 127 percent. During this same time, prices have declined from more than $20 an ounce to less than $6. And as I've emphasized, today's price is far below production costs.

For a nation that provides trade protection for a variety of commodities, is it really too much for the silver industry to be allowed a fair chance to compete?

TRIBUTE TO RUTH U. KEETON

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a remarkable Maryland public servant who will soon be retiring. Ruth U. Keeton will retire this month from the Howard County Council. Ruth has served 14 years on the council and during that time she has exemplified all we come to expect from a public servant.

Most notably, Ruth has consistently encouraged the development of low-income housing in her county and the State. In 1981, she was recognized for her ability and named to the statewide government housing task force, which produced a report that still influences Maryland's housing priorities. Also, she has been instrumental in protecting the county's vital farmland. Ruth led the drive to start the county's first Farmland Preservation Program. And Ruth's concern for the environment was rewarded when Maryland Gov. William Donald Schaefer appointed her to the Patuxent River Commission.

Mr. Speaker, we don't often see a person with this level of dedication matched with such a warm personality. Ruth has not only been an asset to the county, but a joy to work with. I know she'll be missed in Howard County Council chambers, but we wish her well in her retirement.

EDNA HIBEL: A TRIBUTE TO ARTISTIC QUALITY

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with you and my distinguished colleagues the wonderful talents of Miss Edna Hibel.

Edna has enjoyed an illustrious career as a painter, master artist, and humanitarian. Her credits are many and include awards from the United Nations, Pope John Paul II, Queen Elizabeth II, Cordon Bleu Society, and the World Academy of Art and Science.

The Hibel Museum of Art, located in Palm Beach, FL, stands as a everlasting tribute to this outstanding artist and wonderful individual who has enjoyed a world-renowned reputation for quality and loving dedication.

As a personal friend, I can testify to her undying dedication toward art and humanity. Her exhibits continue to carry a message of world peace and human love to people throughout the world.

Edna will return to China with her historic art exhibition scheduled for display September 11 through September 23, 1989. As the only foreign artist to have the opportunity to return to China for a second showing, the invitation is a supreme honor.

For our enjoyment back in the United States, we will have the opportunity to view Edna's work first hand on June 16 at the National Museum of Women in the Arts. I urge everyone to take this opportunity to view Edna's talent first hand. I am sure you will find her paintings both enlightening and uplifting.

POPPY MONTH

HON. JAN MEYERS

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues the declaration of May as "Poppy Month" in the great State of Kansas. Gov. Mike Hayden will sign the official "Poppy Month" proclamation on Thursday, March 9.

In 1920, the American Legion Auxiliary adopted the poppy and, since then, it has served as a public reminder of the thousands of lives sacrificed in the four wars the United States has participated in. In keeping with tradition, red paper poppies are handmade at the Veterans' Administration hospital in Leavenworth, KS, by hospitalized veterans. The poppies are then offered to the public, for a donation, on "Poppy Day." The donations collected are then used to assist needy veterans and their families.

It is an honor to salute the Kansas American Legion Auxiliary and Edyth Mae Jones, the Kansas poppy chairman, for their gallant efforts in assisting the Disabled Veterans of Kansas. Please join me, Mr. Speaker, as I pay tribute to this special group of people, and as I recognize May as "Poppy Month" in Kansas.

EMIGRATION FROM THE SOVIET UNION

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, while emigration from the Soviet Union has sharply increased in response to pressure from the international community and glasnost in the U.S.S.R., the picture on emigration remains mixed. The results, in terms of overall numbers of exit visas granted, have been positive, but concerns have been raised with respect to emigration procedures which remain unfairly restrictive and arbitrary.

Many refuseniks are still denied permission to leave for reasons of state security, even when there is no reasonable basis for security risks in allowing emigration. Protests against this injustice have been voiced many times by Members of this body, and by people of good will around the world.

Today a group of women refuseniks in the Soviet Union will begin a hunger strike to protest the Soviet authorities' continued refusal to grant them permission to emigrate. Many of the group, styled Jewish Women against Refusal, have been waiting for more than a decade to be repatriated to Israel or reunited with family. Their children, several of whom were born in refusal, are now second generation refuseniks. Some have married, and a third generation is joining the refusenik ranks.

Clearly, the U.S.S.R. is bound by the Helsinki accords which require emigration for family unification as a basic human right recognized by the signatories of the accords, including both the United States and the Soviet Union. Our support of these refuseniks is based on the rights and duties recognized by these international agreements.

Mr. Speaker, I would invite my colleagues to join me in supporting the protest of these courageous women: Inna Ospensky, Eugenia Berenfeld, Ludmila Fridman, Tatyana Futoryanskaya, Olga Goldfarb, Elena Golovina-Lokshina, Polena Golub, Tamara Gurfink, Galina Livshitz, Judith Lurie, Natalya Magazanik, Rimma Mushinskaya, Mela Novik, Elena Rappaport, Marina Shulman, Irene Sterkina, Natalya Stonova, Irene Tyomkina, Alla Varshavskaya, Ludmila Yakhonta, Marina Gorelic-Salganic, Sofia Wander, Olga Kagna, Sheyla Alexandrovsky, Lidia Axelrod, Olga Gersheles-Dinkins, Olga Kelman, Olga Komsitskaya, Olga Osrivskaya, Irene Pisarevskaya, Tamara Pliss, Lilia Rabinovich, Marina Shmidt, Oxana Kotlyer, Larisa Kotovskaya, Lubov Rozenberg, Karmela Raiz, Ala Stomatovta, Irina Ichkina, and Anna Markova.

The support and concern of individuals for these women is commendable, but it is not enough. Public policy provides an effective expression of that concern. Given the fluidity that may now exist in Soviet policy on emigration, the United States must continue to exert pressure on the Soviet Union to make concessions on emigration and human rights as preconditions to improvement in other areas of the bilateral relationship. Since the 1970's the United States has sought to expand Soviet emigration by linking trade and credit to emigration performance. The interconnection between human rights, trade, and arms control will express our solidarity with those Soviet citizens who await permission to emigrate.

Mr. Speaker, I am inspired by the courageous example of the Jewish Women against Refusal. Some might ask what difference they will make, a handful of women fasting for justice. I, for one, have no doubt their fast will make a difference, as a living witness to the enormous power of a people yearning to be free.

TRIBUTE TO THE SOCIETY OF AMERICAN FLORISTS

HON. JOHN MILLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the efforts of the Society of American Florists [SAF] and to praise the hard work and leadership of Mr. Sten Crissey, president-elect of the Society of American Florists. He is the owner and proprietor of Crissey Flowers and Gifts, one of Washington State's finest floral shops, and a good friend of mine. The society was responsible for all the superb floral displays at each of the official bicentennial inaugural events.

Mr. Crissey, from my own State of Washington, helped procure, prepare, and design over 300,000 floral pieces into the stunning exhibits that we were all privileged to enjoy during inauguration week. The final product of those efforts was a fine example of the splendid work the floral industry provides. All segments of the industry united their efforts to benefit the inauguration of our new President. SAF is the only trade association representing all segments of the floral industry including growers, wholesalers, retailers, and suppliers. All their displays were beautiful, and added to the pomp and splendor of such a historic event.

The contribution of SAF, Sten Crissey, and all the volunteers to the bicentennial inauguration gave this prestigious occasion an added sense of pride and grandeur.

Growers, wholesalers, and retailers donated their time, expertise, and resources to this effort. Their displays showcased the industry's product. The floral industry should be proud of its accomplishment and congratulated on its success. Their diligent work, and overwhelming success, contributed to the spirit of nationalism and celebration. I again thank and congratulate Mr. Crissey, the Society of American Florists, all the volunteers, and the floral industry itself for their contribution to the inauguration of President George Herbert Walker Bush.

REFUSENIK WOMEN FAST FOR PERMISSION TO EMIGRATE

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on this the second day of the fast by a group of courageous refusenik women, I want to reiterate the importance of the purpose of their fast. It is that while the Soviet Union has allowed a sizable increase in the emigration rates in the past year, the Soviet authorities continue to persecute the individuals and families who, for a very long time, have sought permission to emigrate.

Today, I am honoring the women who have risked everything in their efforts to be reunited with family in Israel and elsewhere, who simply want to be able to observe their religion without fear of persecution. Most of these women have sought to be repatriated to Israel or reunited with family for more than a decade. For asking for the fundamental freedom of movement, these women and their families, their children and their grandchildren have become scapegoats in Soviet society.

I owe gratitude also for Action for Soviet Jewry in Waltham, MA, for their outstanding work on this issue, and for the work of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, who yesterday honored, here in Washington, Alec and Galina Zelichonik. The Zelichoniks only a few months ago still suffered at the hands of Soviet authorities and today live freely in Israel thanks, in part, to the hard work of Action for Soviet Jewry, the Union of Councils, the Congressional Human Rights Caucus, and many others.

TAX CREDITS FOR SECURITY DEVICES OFFERED

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, home burglary is an epidemic in all of our districts. The FBI reports that more than 2 million burglaries occurred in 1988—that translates into one burglary every 15 seconds.

Tragically, senior citizens are the most frequent victims of burglary. Seniors and other Americans who are justifiably fearful of burglary, are now being forced to purchase home security devices for protection.

I believe that Congress should assist those who are trying to make their homes and neighborhoods safe again.

Today, I am introducing legislation which would allow individuals a partial income tax credit for the purchase and installation of locks, alarms, security lighting, protective window bars, and other security devices for their home. Taxpayers would receive a credit of 25 percent of expenses incurred for home security, with a maximum credit of $250.00.

A larger credit would be offered to senior citizens. Those 65 years of age and over would receive a credit of 100 percent of expenses incurred, with a maximum credit of $500.00.

I urge other Members to join in sponsoring this important legislation.

BOOTS AND SADDLES TOUR IN NEW MEXICO

HON. JOE SKEEN

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 9, 1989

Mr. SKEEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that will lead the way in creating the Boots and Saddles Tour in New Mexico. This designation will not only recognize the importance of numerous frontier forts that were established in New Mexico, but help protect these historic sites from further deterioration.

I am pleased to say that Senator JEFF BINGAMAN, along with Senator PETE DOMENICI, have introduced similar legislation in the Senate.

My legislation asks the Secretary of the Interior to study the feasibility of establishing an interagency management group to develop various ways of interpreting and preserving eight historic forts that played a significant role in the history of New Mexico. The study would also evaluate establishing tour routes for vehicles and horseback riders which would connect these forts.

The forts that will be studied truly have a significant and colorful place not only in New Mexico's history, but also in the settlement of the Western frontier. The role of these forts varied from helping to protect important transportation routes, to providing a base of operations in fighting famous Indian leaders.

Let me provide a brief description of these forts. Fort Cummings was used as the base of operations for the Apache wars against Indian leaders Cochise, Victorio, and Geronimo, and in protecting part of the Butterfield stage route. Fort Stanton was used by Kit Carson as the center for his campaign against the Apache and Navajos. Fort Seldon served to protect settlers from Apache raids. Fort Bayard played a key role in the campaigns against Geronimo. Soldiers at Fort McRae fought to deny Navajo and Apache raiding parties the use of a popular east-west trail. Fort Craig was the largest Civil War fort in the West. Fort Sumner was used to house Apache and Navajo captives of Kit Carson. And during the Civil War, soldiers at Fort Union guarded the Santa Fe Trail, the main artery of supply for the Federal armies in the West.

All of these forts were abandoned for military purposes long ago. But many of them are largely intact, others still contain interesting, physical remains that should be protected.

I believe it is important to preserve and provide national recognition to these priceless treasures of our pioneer history. This legislation will lead the way to accomplishing this goal. By preserving these forts, we can also create an exciting opportunity for the public to visit these sites and gain a greater appreciation of what it took to settle the frontier West.

SENATE—Monday, March 13, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order previously entered, the Senate will stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on Wednesday next.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1989

Thereupon, at 12 noon, the Senate recessed until Wednesday, March 15, 1989, at 10 a.m.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, March 13, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

For all Your good gifts, O God, we offer our praise; for Your providence to us through all the years, we offer our word of gratitude. As we look to the days ahead, may not Your loving concern for us lessen, or Your acts of forgiveness and mercy for us ever diminish, but may Your mighty hand of grace ever give us the strength and the peace that You alone can give. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] kindly lead the Members in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. MONTGOMERY led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 553. An act to provide for more balance in the stocks of dairy products purchased by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

A TRIBUTE TO THE FIGHTING IRISH AND THEIR SUPPORTERS

(Mr. HILER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, as college football fans everywhere know, January 2, 1989, was a great day for the Irish. On that day, the Fighting Irish of the University of Notre Dame won the Fiesta Bowl and secured the national championship to the delight of their thousands of fans. Although I am certainly one of them, I enjoy a privilege my fellow Notre Dame fans do not. I have the honor to represent the University of Notre Dame in this body.

I wish to take this opportunity to commend Lou Holtz, his staff, and the superb athletes they coach on a tremendous victory over a very tough University of West Virginia team. The victory over the Mountaineers capped an outstanding 12-0 season for the team. The university, the community, the Nation can be proud of them.

Their achievement shows the dedication and determination that inspire millions. I am not an alumnus of the college, so I don't think I can be accused of the sin of bragging, when I say that I believe Notre Dame, and its football team, are loved in a special way. Over the years, the Fighting Irish have won their share of national championships, produced many Heisman Trophy winners and boast some of the legendary names of college football—Knute Rockne, George Gipp, the Four Horsemen, Frank Leahy, and scores of others. But that success has not come at the expense of educational excellence. Notre Dame wins the old fashioned way. The players and the coaches play by the rules. Players at Notre Dame are students first. They either make the grades, or don't play. They go to class, they earn their diplomas and they graduate. In this day of widespread scandal and cheating in college athletic programs, Notre Dame is to be commended for adhering to academic principles and for refusing to conform to the notion of "win at any cost."

So, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the students, faculty, administration, and friends of the University of Notre Dame on the great accomplishment of their outstanding football team. I am honored to represent this fine institution, and I have every confidence that Coach Holtz and the Fighting Irish will keep me coming back to this floor to commend them for many victories in the future.

LEGISLATION TO REQUIRE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A PRESIDENTIAL EMERGENCY BOARD IN THE EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE

(Mr. STANGELAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, later this week, the House will consider legislation that would require the President to appoint a Presidential Emergency Board [PEB] in the Eastern Air Lines strike.

In my view, the establishment of such a board in this case is not justified on either legal or policy grounds. The Railway Labor Act requires such a board only when there is a national transportation emergency. Although some people are certainly inconvenienced, a strike at one airline does not create a national emergency.

In addition, the Emergency Board has no power to end the dispute. It can only make recommendations which will certainly be ignored by one or both parties.

In the end, the only way to resolve this dispute is for both parties to sit down and negotiate it out. That will occur only when we no longer hold out this false hope of Government intervention through an Emergency Board.

I am also including in the RECORD additional points that Members are welcome to use when we consider this bill later this week, including two editorials.

Mr. Speaker, on March 9, the Committee on Public Works and Transportation reported H.R. 1231 to establish a Presidential Emergency Board to investigate the labor dispute at Eastern Air Lines.

Arguments in opposition to this legislation follow as well as two pertinent editorials.

ARGUMENTS IN OPPOSITION TO H.R. 1231

I. There is no basis for convening an emergency board under the Railway Labor Act.

Under the Railway Labor Act, an emergency board may be convened by the President if the airline labor dispute "threaten(s) substantially to interrupt interstate commerce to a degree such as to deprive any section of the country of essential transportation services."

No such interruption or threat has occurred since the strike against Eastern began 10 days ago. Other air carriers and other modes of transportation have been able to provide transportation in the absence of Eastern.

There is no logic whatever in applying the Railway Labor Act to a competitive industry that could handle a strike without creating a major dislocation. Since deregulation, other airlines are readily available to provide the service. Other transportation modes can help also.

For this reason, no emergency board has been convened in any of the five major airline strikes since the industry was deregulated in 1978, even though they involved carriers, such as United, which are larger than Eastern.

II. If a substantial interruption to commerce is achieved as a result of secondary picketing, the appropriate response would be for the Congress to ban secondary picketing in the airline and railroad industries.

□ This symbol represents the time of day during the House proceedings, e.g., □ 1407 is 2:07 p.m.

Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

The only factor that threatens a national transportation emergency in this case is the ability of labor to conduct secondary picketing.

Instead of creating an emergency board, Congress should ban secondary picketing. This would solve the problem of disruption to commerce while permitting the parties to this labor dispute to fight it out on their own turf.

It is important to emphasize that the "right" to conduct secondary picketing is unique to the airline and railroad industries, and even there it has been recognized only for the last two years.

Secondary picketing gives labor the power to turn a purely local dispute into a national crisis. In effect, it gives labor the power to hold hostage the users of transportation services across the country—passengers, shippers and consumers—to achieve their goals in a dispute with one employer.

No other industry is allowed to engage in this type of secondary picketing.

III. The creation of a Presidential Emergency Board will do nothing to achieve resolution of the labor dispute between Eastern and the machinists. We will simply find ourselves in the same position 26 days from now as we are today.

The parties have been in mediation for over a year without coming close to an agreement. There is little likelihood that the parties will agree to the recommendations of a board.

If the Congress is willing to prolong the process now by establishing an emergency board, the Congress will likely legislate further cooling off periods when the 26 days end. In the 3 most recent rail disputes where emergency boards were established, additional cooling off periods of 2 to 3 months beyond the initial 26 day period were mandated by Congress.

Since the parties are not likely to come to agreement, we are left with either a series of additional cooling off periods (which will surely kill Eastern) or a legislative solution to the entire dispute. Legislative "cramdowns" are definitely not a desirable way to settle private labor disputes in the airline industry.

The only way to resolve this dispute is to allow the battle to go on as it does in any other industry: let the parties use self-help and let the chips fall where they may.

IV. The only way for Eastern Airlines to survive is through a quick resolution of the current labor dispute. The survival of Eastern as a viable carrier is important to maintaining competition in the airline industry.

Eastern has lost almost $500 million since the mediation process began and was losing more than $1 million each day before the strike began.

If the parties are required to go back to the status quo as it existed before the strike began, Eastern will lose money at a much greater rate because it will take time to restore its service to previous levels.

Establishment of a Presidential Emergency Board will not lead to a resolution of the dispute. It will only prolong the dispute.

The only possibility for a quick resolution of the dispute is to allow the strike to proceed. Eastern may not be able to survive a strike, but at least there will be some resolution of the issue. Whether or not Eastern survives should be a function of the actions taken by labor and management. It should not be the function of government imposed solutions.

With increasing concentration in the airline industry, it is important for Eastern to remain a viable air carrier. The demise of Eastern will result in further concentration in the industry and a corresponding decline in competition.

V. The Railway Labor Act is outmoded and is no longer an efficient or fair way to resolve labor disputes in the airline industry.

The Railway Labor Act was enacted in 1926, at a time when the railroads were heavily regulated and essentially the only means of transportation. The Act was extended to the airlines in the 1930's when the industry was young and heavily regulated.

The Act was designed to prevent strikes, because any strike against a railroad would be likely to cripple the national transportation system. It did so by creating an open-ended mediation process, during which the status quo would be preserved. Existing contracts under the Act do not terminate until a new contract is in place.

Indeed, the preservation of the status quo under the Railway Labor Act always favors one party over the other. In inflationary times management has an incentive to keep negotiations open so as to avoid paying higher wages. In deflationary times, or when an industry is particularly competitive, labor has an incentive to keep negotiations open to avoid wage cuts.

In this case Eastern has been locked in negotiations for 17 months under the preexisting contract terms. During this time it has lost almost half a billion dollars.

In summary, the rationale for the Railway Labor Act is no longer relevant to a deregulated airline industry. A competitive transportation industry no longer needs special provisions to avoid strikes at all costs. Labor disputes in the airline industry should be treated the same as in any other industry.

VI. As a general rule, the Federal government should stay out of labor disputes.

An emergency board has authority only to recommend, not to impose a resolution of the dispute. Because of the animosity and distance between the parties, any such recommendation would undoubtedly be rejected, by one or both of the parties. Enormous pressure would then be focused on Congress and the President for enactment of legislation imposing a contract on the parties.

Settling labor disputes by Federal statutes is bad public policy, especially when the dispute arises in an industry which is as highly competitive as the aviation industry.

Moreover, in the case of the dispute between Eastern and its unions, it would be unprecedented for the government to intervene in a situation where the company involved is losing the enormous sums of money that Eastern is losing and is in the dire economic predicament that Eastern is in.

And finally, intervening in the Eastern dispute will encourage other transportation unions to settle their disputes in the political arena.

VII. The bill is flawed because the emergency board's proceedings cover two unions, the Airline Pilots Association and the Transportation Workers Union, who have not gone through the collective bargaining requirements of the Railway Labor Act.

Unlike the International Association of Machinists, these two unions have not reached a state of impasse with Eastern.

While there might be some cases where an emergency board is justified when the parties have exhausted all procedures under the Railway Labor Act, it is never justified where parties are in a preliminary stage. This short circuits the process and sets a bad precedent for unions and management to come to Congress to resolve their differences.

It is particularly ludicrous to expect an emergency board to arrive at comprehensive recommendations for labor agreements with these two unions in 19 days, when their negotiations are still preliminary.

VIII. The shortening of the time periods in the bill does not solve the defects in the bill. If anything it will make it more difficult for the emergency board to reach meaningful recommendations.

The committee amendment shortens the time for the emergency board to report to the President from 30 days to 14 days, with a possible extension of 5 days. After the board reports, the cooling off period is 7 days (reduced from 30 days).

No matter when this period ends, there is virtually no chance that this process will result in the parties coming any closer together.

The shortening of the time period is illusory and creates the false hope that the board will actually be able to produce results in that period. In fact, the average length of emergency boards in airline labor disputes is 77 days. We can't expect that, in a dispute as complicated as this one, a board will come to resolution in this short a period.

IX. Eastern's filing for bankruptcy under chapter 11 makes H.R. 1231 ill advised and possibly unconstitutional.

If the effect of H.R. 1231 would be to override the power of the bankruptcy judge to carry out his authority to change the terms and conditions of employment, it might well violate Article 1, section 8, clause 4 of the Constitution, which requires uniform bankruptcy laws.

Any further attempt by Congress to legislate the recommendations of a presidential emergency board would have even greater constitutional problems. This is very similar to the law that provided up to $75 million in unemployment benefits in the Rock Island Railroad reorganization, which was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

EASTERN ON STRIKE

Fortunately for travelers and commuters, the machinists striking Eastern Airlines have not so far tried to extend the disruption with secondary boycotts. Perhaps it is fortunate for the machinists' union as well. Frank Lorenzo, who controls Eastern, has generated a degree of public sympathy for the airline's employees through his harsh and heavy-handed tactics in dealing with them. That sympathy would quickly vanish if the union set out deliberately to strand as many people as possible by picketing railroads and other airlines with no part in this quarrel and no responsibility for it. For the people holding Eastern tickets, the inconvenience has already been more than sufficient.

Some of the union's officials continue to talk of fighting the court orders against secondary picketing and then proceeding to carry their strike to other carriers. The strategy would be to create such chaos that the mounting economic damage would force President Bush to appoint the emergency board that they seek. It would begin a process that ends with congressional legislation writing, in effect, a union contract into law and imposing it on the employer. It's an obsolete procedure that has no place in a deregulated airline industry.

Mr. Bush refused on Friday to take that road. The administration has added that, if the union attempts secondary boycotts, it will immediately seek legislation to prohibit them. But both the White House and the machinists must realize that this strike is not going to be ended by legislation—neither the kind that the union wants nor the kind that the administration threatens. In Congress, each side is quite capable of blocking the other. The case for abolishing secondary boycotts is strong, and in all industries but transportation they were prohibited a generation ago. But the composition of the labor committees makes it highly unlikely that any bill will move as long as the strike continues.

As for the strike itself, it's off to a bad start for Eastern. Management clearly underestimated the pilots' and flight attendants' resentment of their treatment at the hands of Mr. Lorenzo. The airline had hoped to fly through the strike with nearly normal operations, using newly hired nonunion mechanics and baggage handlers to replace the strikers. That clearly isn't going to work. Eastern has now had to cancel all but a very few flights.

It's an airline with a long and respected history, but this strike may destroy it. Mr. Lorenzo has been looking for trouble ever since he took control of Eastern. Now he has found it, and perhaps more than he bargained for. It's hard to be very sorry.

MR. KIRKLAND'S WORDS, MR. BUSH'S TEST

Lane Kirkland, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O., protests that an editorial on Friday wrongly characterized his position on the labor dispute at Eastern Air Lines. The editorial, drawing from published news reports, said he had warned, if there should be a strike against Eastern, of widespread disruption in the transportation industry, including moves against railroads. Mr. Kirkland says he said no such thing [see Letters], and we accept that with apology for the error.

Others in organized labor do talk of secondary job actions. For instance, the heads of the railroad unions recently declared, ominously, that labor action against Eastern "has the potential to spread to other air carriers, as well as the rail commuter and freight industry." How the President responds to such threats will likely have a lasting effect on labor relations nationwide.

The National Mediation Board, a feeble agency charged with keeping labor peace in the rail and airline industries, has recommended that the President use his authority to prevent a strike for 60 days. Such intervention would set a dangerous precedent, effectively ending the neutrality of the Federal government in the dispute and short-circuiting collective bargaining.

The dispute involves Eastern's baggage handlers and mechanics. Their labor contract expired 13 months ago; only last month did the Mediation Board finally get around to declaring a bargaining impasse, opening the way for a work stoppage on Saturday. Eastern has vowed to fly through a strike and labor is worried that Eastern could succeed.

That explains the threats to disrupt service at other airlines and on railroads, something that the Supreme Court seems to sanction. These threats give the President the legal rationale and the political incentive to put off a strike for 60 days while a board proposes settlement terms

No board would be likely to find the mutually acceptable settlement that has eluded bargainers for so long. But Eastern, hobbled by work slowdowns, is losing so much money that it would probably run out of cash before the 60 days ended. And that would probably force Eastern's management to sell the carrier in pieces—to airlines more willing to pay industry-scale wages.

Why would that be so terrible? Because Eastern's demise would eliminate the carrier with the greatest incentive to lower fares to gain market share and to keep the industry competitive. More important, if Eastern were thus defeated, Washington would leave itself open to future obstructionism. Why should the transport unions bargain in good faith if the White House can be bullied into stopping strikes at the expense of any troubled carrier?

If the Federal Government does anything to intervene, it should be for the long term, in the interpretation of labor law. The Supreme Court holds that transport unions are uniquely free to entangle the Government in their labor disputes by disrupting service with secondary strikes. The permanent answer to bullying and threats is for Congress to make such boycotts illegal.

For the moment, however, Mr. Bush's wisest immediate course is clear: to stay out of the way.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE HONORABLE DALE E. KILDEE, MEMBER OF CONGRESS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable DALE E. KILDEE:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 7, 1989.

Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, H204 Capitol.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to notify you, pursuant to Rule L(50) of the Rules of the House of Representatives, that an employee in my office has been served with a subpoena duces tecum issued by the State of Michigan, 68th Judicial District.

After consultation with the General Counsel to the Clerk, and with agreement of the constituents involved, I will comply with the subpoena.

Sincerely,

DALE E. KILDEE,
Member of Congress.

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO FILE CERTAIN REPORTS ON H.R. 1231, EASTERN AIR LINES STRIKE LEGISLATION

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation may have until 5 p.m. today, Monday, March 13, 1989, to file certain reports on H.R. 1231.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Republican leadership, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

WORKING POOR WOULD BENEFIT BY EARNED INCOME TAX CREDIT REFORM

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, we have the lowest level of unemployment in 15 years—but Congress can still change all that.

All we have to do is raise the minimum wage.

A $4.65 minimum wage would destroy hundreds of thousands of jobs for low-skilled workers. That's what the so-called friends of the working poor have planned.

And, Mr. Speaker, nobody seems to be talking about the effect a higher minimum wage would have on the Federal budget.

Last year, Beryl Sprinkel, of the Council of Economic Advisers estimated that increasing the minimum wage to $4.65 would increase the budget deficit by $2 to $6 billion per year.

Two to six billion dollars per year.

Where is the money going to come from?

It's all so pointless when there is a better way to help the working poor.

Reform the earned income tax credit!

Target the aid directly to poor workers who are supporting families.

If accomplished in accordance with my Family Living Wage Act, reform of the earned income tax credit would provide more aid to those who need it, and do it at less cost—both in terms of jobs and money—than would raising the minimum wage.

It is time for new thinking instead of yesterday's failed so-called solutions.

Reform the earned income tax credit.

THE POTENTIAL PITFALLS OF LEGISLATION CREATING EASTERN AIRLINES EMERGENCY BOARD

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to inform my colleagues that the full Committee on Public Works and Transportation reported H.R. 1231 to the House on March 9, 1989. This legislation directs the President to establish an emergency board under section 10 of the Railway Labor Act to investigate and make recommendations concerning the labor dispute at Eastern Air Lines. A majority of committee Republicans believe that the labor dispute at Eastern must come to an end at the earliest possible opportunity. It is our position that the creation of a Presidential emergency board will only delay efforts to resolve the dispute and may, in fact, jeopardize the continued existence of a very fine airline.

It is expected that this legislation will be taken up on the House floor as early as Wednesday of this week. I urge my colleagues to pay close attention to this legislation which may cause the liquidation of Eastern Air Lines.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I direct their attention to the minority views contained in the extension of remarks, which I am inserting today, outlining the potential pitfalls of this ill-conceived legislation.

A TRIBUTE TO FRANCIS MARION, SOUTH CAROLINA'S "SWAMP FOX"

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALLON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, throughout the long history of the State of South Carolina, there have been a number of individuals who have helped to shape our State through great achievement and personal sacrifice. One such man is Francis Marion, who, despite his great victories and political accomplishments has never been sufficiently recognized.

Francis Marion was born on the coastal plains of colonial South Carolina in the 1730's—the date of his birth is only indicated by the fact that it is known that he died in his 63d year.

He spent his youth near the port town of Georgetown, helping out his family, until he decided to go to sea at the age of 15. This did not go well for him.

Francis Marion was in a shipwreck on a return trip to South Carolina from the West Indies. He traveled for many days in a small open boat with six other men and a dog.

Only five of them survived the ordeal, and when he was rescued, Francis Marion decided to pursue his life on land, returning to his family and farming.

Francis Marion's military career began at the age of 25 when he enlisted to do battle with Cherokee Indians who were threatening a community of colonial South Carolinians. He led a small group of men against the Cherokee at the Battle of Etchoee, but shortly after the battle the Indians burned the ripening fields and the entire village of Etchoee. It was said to have brought tears to Marion's eyes.

In 1775 Marion served as a member of the South Carolina Provincial Congress, and subsequently became a captain in the army of a volunteer group to fight the British in the Charleston area. In February 1776 he was promoted to major, and then in November to lieutenant colonel.

In 1780, due to a sprained ankle, Francis Marion was left behind in Charleston to risk imminent capture when Gen. Benjamin Lincoln surrendered his troops to the British forces. But he gathered together a small band of men and descended into the swamps and created a secret hideout on Snow's Island on the Pee Dee River.

From these secluded headquarters Francis Marion continued to fight for the revolutionary cause. Small bands of rebel soldiers led by Marion would raid the British camps. The British were surprised time after time by the swiftness with which Marion and his troops would attack and slip away into the swamps. They became intent on capturing Francis Marion.

One British cavalry officer in particular, Banastre Tarleton, took an extreme interest in capturing Marion. In one particular incident Tarleton had been chasing Marion through 26 miles of swamp for 7 hours when he has been quoted as saying, "But as for this damn old fox, the devil himself could not catch him!"

Tarleton never did catch Francis Marion, and through his then legendary feats, Marion became endeared to all South Carolinians as the "Swamp Fox."

In August 1781, Marion and his troops made a successful attempt to rescue Americans who were surrounded by British Troops at Parkers Ferry, SC. As a result of this successful mission, Marion received a thanks from Congress, and soon after was advanced to brigadier general. Also in 1781, Francis Marion was elected as a representative to the South Carolina Legislature. He was reelected in 1782 and 1784.

At the end of the war, Francis Marion settled into a somewhat quieter existence, marrying a cousin named Mary Videau and living at Pond Bluff, SC. He died on February 26, 1795, his accomplishments already sealed within the history of the fledgling United States of America.

In 1783, before Marion died, the Senate of South Carolina passed the following resolutions to recognize and thank Marion:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be given to Brigadier General Francis Marion, in his place, as a member of this House, for his eminent and conspicuous services to his country."

Resolved, That a gold medal be given to Brigadier General Francis Marion, as a mark of public approbation for his great, glorious, and meritorious conduct.

It is believed that the resolution and a laudatory speech to Francis Marion was as far as the action was taken—the gold medal was never presented to Marion.

Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a joint resolution that the Congress might properly recognize the accomplishments of this great patriot. I would also like to thank my constituent, Russell Black, of Berkeley County, who first brought the resolution passed by the State senate to my attention.

REMEMBERING THE KATYN FOREST MASSACRE

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, the massacre in Katyn Forest took place a generation ago, in a place now nearly forgotten by much of the world. But to many believers in freedom and justice, the slaughter of thousands of Polish officers 45 years ago remains an unpunished crime.

Last year, in memory of those young officers—the best and the brightest of the Polish Army—I requested this House to authorize the reprinting of the 1952 report to the House Select Committee which investigated this enormous crime. That report found that the truth about the Katyn Forest atrocities was covered up, suppressed, and distorted by the then-Soviet Government and by well-intentioned but wrong Allied officials. I urge my colleagues to read that report, which is available from the Committee on House Administration.

Now, the Polish Government has finally acknowledged that the Stalin government and Stalin's NKVD were responsible. That is the conclusion that the Select Committee reached in 1952. Finally, a 45-year effort to conceal the truth and cover up the responsibility has ended.

Mr. Speaker, it is long past the time for the truth to be told, but it is finally being told. The new winds sweeping through the Communist bloc will expose the crimes of the old governments and perhaps begin the process of healing some festering wounds.

Mr. Speaker, I include an article from the New York Times of March 8, 1989, which reports the present conclusion of the Polish Government that the Katyn Forest Massacre was carried out by the Soviet secret police:

POLAND OFFICIALLY SHIFTS THE BLAME TO SOVIETS FOR WARTIME MASSACRE

(By John Tagliabue)

WARSAW, March 7.—Poland's Government said today that Soviet forces were responsible for a massacre of Polish officers during World War II.

The charge, made by the Government's spokesman, Jerzy Urban, represented a basic shift in the official Government position in rejecting what for 45 years has been the official Soviet version of the crime—namely, that it was Nazi German soldiers who killed the 4,443 Polish officers whose bodies were found in mass graves 45 years ago in the Katyn Forest, near Smolensk.

Mr. Urban said, "We believe that everything indicates the crime was committed by the Stalinist N.K.V.D.," the initials for the Soviet secret police in the Stalinist period.

The accusation came in response to a question from a Polish reporter on the work of a joint Soviet-Polish historical commission. Mr. Urban's response appeared to have been carefully prepared, as is often the case when the Government wishes to make a formal pronouncement on a weighty issue.

The Soviet Union has always admitted that the Poles found at Katyn were among 15,000 reserve officers originally seized by Soviet forces in 1939, when the Soviet Army took Eastern Poland under the terms of the Hitler-Stalin pact. Successive Communist governments in Warsaw have adhered to the Soviet version that the Germans executed the officers in 1941 after over-running the Soviet camp where the Poles had been held. But repeated investigations have found strong evidence that Soviet soldiers killed the Polish officers found at Katyn, shooting each in the back of the head.

The other 10,600 Polish officers vanished.

COINCIDES WITH TALKS ON FUTURE

Few issues go to the heart of Polish-Soviet relations as deeply as the Katyn massacre, in which many Poles believe Stalin wiped out the flower of Poland's leadership. The resonance of the killings has gone beyond Poland to the West, figuring on the lists of Stalin's most heinous crimes, and their coverup as one of the most malicious instances of the Soviet manipulation of history.

In recent weeks, several Polish newspapers have published reports suggesting that the massacre was carried out by the Soviets. Last week, the Polish Foreign Minister, Tadeusz Olechowski, addressing Parliament, urged the Soviet Union to disclose the truth about the killings.

The statement, coming as the Government continued its delicate talks about Poland's future with the opposition movement surrounding the Solidarity trade union, appeared to put the onus of admission on Moscow.

[In Moscow, the Russian-language service of the Soviet press agency Tass distributed a four-paragraph report on Mr. Urban's news conference that made no reference to his remarks about the massacre. The Tass report dealt only with the talks between Solidarity and the Government.]

PACE OF COMMISSION'S WORK

When the Polish leader, Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, announced in 1987 that a joint commission was being established to illuminate the "blank spots" in Polish-Soviet affairs, hopes were raised in Poland that Soviet glasnost might at last help reveal fate of the thousands of missing Polish officers. The commission is also examining the 1939 Hitler-Stalin pact by which Russia and Nazi Germany agreed to divide Poland, and the actions of Soviet forces in the 1944 Warsaw uprising when—according to many Poles and most Western historians—Red Army units waited to permit Nazi troops to crush the resistance of pro-Western insurgents and raze the city.

Poland's decision to move ahead and make disclosures on Katyn appears to signal official dissatisfaction with the slow pace of the commission's work. Mr. Urban acknowledged that the Soviet historians in the commission "rightly" claimed that the materials presented by the Poles—consisting essentially of Red Cross reports on the discovery of the graves—represented only "circumstantial evidence," and that the Soviet historians sought their own evidence in Soviet archives. But he said the Polish Government sought a "higher pace" to the work.

STALIN ACCUSED GERMANS

After German forces exhumed the bodies in 1943, the Germans contended the men had been executed in 1940 by Soviet troops.

Stalin responded that the Germans themselves had executed the officers. When the Polish Government in exile in London demanded an explanation, Stalin used the affair as a pretext to sever relations and to establish a Polish government that became the precursor of today's regime.

For Poles, Katyn has long been a matter of national honor, and a challenge to the claim to legitimacy raised by the present Communist regime. In 1981, at the height of the Solidarity movement, a monument to those killed in Katyn was erected in a Warsaw cemetery, only to be removed by the police when the union was crushed by martial law later that year.

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF CHANUTE AIR FORCE BASE

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADIGAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, on February 22, 1989, I testified before the House Armed Services Committee Subcommittee on Military Installations and Facilities in strong opposition to the proposed closure of Chanute Air Force Base. I would like to bring to the attention of my fellow Members the major inaccuracies in the Commission's report regarding Chanute, and to state that the quality and availability of facilities at Chanute directly contradict the closure recommendation. I would welcome any questions Members may have on this matter:

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN ED MADIGAN IN SUPPORT OF CHANUTE AIR FORCE BASE, MILITARY INSTALLATIONS AND FACILITIES SUBCOMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 22, 1989

Madam Chairwoman and Members of the Subcommittee: I want to thank you for the opportunity to testify today. As you know, Chanute Air Force Base which is located in my congressional district, has been recommended for closure by the Commission on Base Closure and Realignment.

I strongly challenge the Commission's recommendation. I do so as someone who has been to Chanute many times and seen firsthand its growth and its potential. No member of the Commission or its staff went to Chanute. No member of the Commission or its staff ever talked with Chanute officials.

The Commission report issued in late December states that Chanute has "a shortage of buildings for training and administration purposes, maintenance, and warehousing . . . a shortage of family housing units, bachelor housing, recreational amenities, and medical and dental facilities." Any one familiar with Chanute would fail to recognize this as a description of Chanute. These statements are blatantly untrue. Without a doubt, the most outrageous statement by the Commission is that "this closure will have moderate impact on local employment."

Today, I would like to provide the subcommittee with accurate information regarding Chanute and the devastating impact a closure would have on this rural area of Illinois. I would also like to share with you the enormous difficulty I have experienced in my efforts to obtain the information used by the Commission in reaching its conclusion that Chanute should be closed.

Chanute AFB is located on 2,125 acres in Rantoul, Illinois, 15 miles north of Champaign/Urbana. On three sides, it is bordered by farmland which would easily accommodate further expansion of the base. It is a technical training center providing training in missile and aircraft mechanics; aerospace ground equipment; aircrew life support systems; fabrication and parachute repair and maintenance; general and special purpose vehicle maintenance; airframe repair; metallurgy and nondestructive inspection; weather forecasting; weather equipment; and fire training in structural fire and aircraft crash and rescue. Individual and military technical training is provided for officers and airmen of the Air Force, Air Force Reserve, Air National Guard, Air Force civilian employees and other Department of Defense agencies. Officers and airmen from 25 allied countries are trained at Chanute. Chanute graduates 24,000 students each year from 168 resident courses.

Chanute is designated as the central Defense Department fire protection and rescue training center and the primary MX missile maintenance training center. All Department of Defense and Coast Guard weather specialists receive their training at Chanute. The quality of its work is well known throughout the Air Force and Chanute has a record of achieving top results. Chanute-trained people have earned the reputation for being the backbone of the air Force's Aerospace Maintenance Team. The internationally known Jet Engine Accident Investigation Course is only one of several advanced technical training courses taught at Chanute. It also provides principal training courses in the maintenance of intercontinental ballistic, air and ground launched cruise, and attack missile systems.

Contrary to the Base Closure Commission, the training facilities at Chanute are adequate, fully utilized and can even be expanded. Many new training facilities have been recently completed. And one, the new $6.8 million weather training facility will be completed this spring.

In fact, the Air Force recently expanded Chanute's mission through its Rivet Workforce program. Two courses were merged and moved to Chanute. The metals corrosion training currently taught at Sheppard AFB, Texas, was merged with the airframe repair specialty into a single curriculum with state-of-the-art repair and protection techniques. All training in basic aircraft and munitions maintenance officer courses is being consolidated at Chanute, moving the basic munitions officer course from Lowry AFB, Colorado.

Perhaps when people think of a training center, they visualize classrooms with neat rows of desks. Under these conditions, using square footage as a kind of measurement might have some value. However, when rating a technical training center, it is meaningless. Tearing down a jet engine is not a classroom procedure with an instructor and a class full of students. It is highly specialized hands-on training with a small teacher-student ratio. And, it requires a building designed to meet the specialized training requirements. Chanute has a new jet engine training center; a new fire training center; a new liquid fuels center; a new weather training center; and an aerospace ground equipment training center, which was completed in 1973.

There are two Minuteman silos—one above ground and one below ground covered by a 40-ton lid. It is enormously expensive to duplicate these already existing and paid for specialized facilities at other bases. Boeing estimates that the cost of moving this one silo alone is $20 million, and that is cheaper than building a new one. I would like to point out that Chanute is the only base which teaches the Minuteman system maintenance program and the only base with inactive silos for training purposes. I think it is very important to keep training and readiness separate.

The Commission claims a shortage of buildings at Chanute for administration. Before the Pentagon was built, White Hall at Chanute was the largest administration building in the military. It is now the second largest. Inside you will find over ten acres of space. The Commission also claims there is a shortage of maintenance and warehousing buildings. Using the Commission's own rule of square footage, the alleged shortage of maintenance space is around 750 square feet—the size of a small apartment. Chanute has adequate warehousing for its needs and has never reached a point where it has been necessary to request additional facilities.

Chanute has consistently earned top honors. In recent years, the base has received awards for energy efficiency and conservation, the Hennessey Trophy three times for Best in the Air Force Food Service, ATC Outstanding Services Squadron, ATC Family Housing Branch of the Year, ATC Medical Logistics Award for the Chanute Hospital. Its outstanding Arts and Crafts facility has been named the model for all Air Force installations. In addition, Air Force Excellence Awards have been won for its Best in the Air Force library, youth activities program, education services, security police, retiree affairs program, family housing management office, Best Small Commissary in the North Central Region, and the Ohio Valley Base Exchange Award. In 1988 alone, Chanute earned 44 of the 80 awards given by ATC. I cite these awards to show that Chanute has not been a mediocre or marginal base. It has been a top caliber base with one of the strongest community relations programs I have seen.

With a younger population of students, Chanute AFB has been exceptionally sensitive to quality of life conditions. The recreational programs and facilities of Chanute are among the finest in the Air Force, and include athletics, hobbies, hunting, fishing, and social activities. The Chanute Athletic complex consists of three gymnasiums, two swimming pools, 14 outdoor tennis courts, two recreation courts, eight softball fields, two running tracks, and a soccer field. The Athletic Forum has eight air-conditioned racquetball courts, Nautilus free-weight room, saunas and steam rooms. The Fitness Center provides individual or group fitness programs. Aerobics and martial arts classes are available. The Sports Arena has an indoor running track, tennis courts and racquetball courts. The base also provides a skeet range, 18-hole golf course, and a 32-lane bowling center. The base has a large stocked lake with two covered pavillions. As mentioned above, the Chanute Arts and Crafts facility is a model for the entire Air Force. The youth center offers a television room, arts and crafts, a game room, snack bar and large gymnasium/multi-purpose room. The youth sports program offers basketball, bowling, cheerleading, football, golf, T-ball and soccer. Classes are available for karate, tap, baton, dance, gymnastics and piano. It is absolutely unbelievable that the Closure Commission would cite this base as lacking in recreational amenities.

The Commission states there is a shortage of family housing units and bachelor housing. Since FY82, $30 million has been spent to upgrade and maintain Chanute's housing. The base has 1,346 family housing units and 95 mobile home spaces. There is an excess 1,000 bed modern dormitory at the base that is not being used at this time. Chanute has a total dormitory capacity of 5,900 beds. One modern 100-room bachelor officers quarters is in use. A new 100-room bachelor officers quarters is over half complete. In the nearby community of Rantoul, there is a seven percent excess of available rental units. Just this month, it was announced that Chanute's Military Family Housing office took second place in Air Force-wide competition. For two consecutive years, the Chanute Housing Office has been the Best in ATC.

The Commission also stated there is a shortage of medical and dental facilities. There is a under-utilized hospital at Chanute. The Commission report on the hospital size is incorrect. The hospital currently uses 35 inpatient beds. It has medical/surgical, obstetrics/gynecology, and special care nursing unit capability. The hospital enjoys a good reputation for meeting the varied medical needs of both the younger active duty personnel and the large number of retired military who live in the community. It has an excellent emergency room. However, the base is unable to use the entire third floor of its hospital due to a lack of available Air Force physicians and staff. With the third floor in use, this hospital can expand to a 130 bed facility. May I mention again that in November 1988, Chanute was rated as having the outstanding medical logistics account in the Air Force for hospitals in the 26-50 bed category.

Across the street from the hospital, there is a modern dental clinic. Outpatient care is available by appointment, and there is an active duty clinic in the late afternoons to accommodate those with training schedules. Emergency care is provided around the clock. Comprehensive dental services are offered, including a plaque control program. I have been told by Air Force personnel that this is the best dental program they have encountered in their years of service.

The Commission declares that closing Chanute would only have a "moderate impact on local employment." If that statement weren't so tragically wrong, it would be laughable. Local community leaders equate the closing of Chanute with the impact of Detroit losing its three major automobile manufacturers.

As of December 28, 1988, there are 3,185 officer, enlisted, and civilian assigned on permanent party status at Chanute plus 800 contract civilian personnel. There are 2,786 students. The Economic Impact Region for Chanute is the 50-mile commuting radius from the center of the base. This area covers all or parts of 13 counties in Illinois and two in Indiana.

The combined salaries of the military ($87,392,139) and civilian ($36,199,029) employees on Chanute total $123,591,168. Chanute is the largest employer in Rantoul, a community of 20,700. In this community alone, 8,000 people have Chanute-related jobs. Applying Air Force methodology of estimating local economic impact, $119,542,603 of Chanute cash-flow dollars was spent in the Rantoul area. Chanute is the second largest employer in the home county of Champaign, second only to the University of Illinois. This alone would indicate a major impact. However, there are other economic factors I would like to bring to your attention.

There are 4,614 military retirees residing in the 50-mile radius, and military retirement pay received totals $45,509,688.

Twenty-five percent of the Combined Federal Campaign contributions collected go into Champaign County. Last year the county received $44,668,000.

The prestigious University of Illinois has done a preliminary regional economic impact study on the proposed closure. Contrary to the Commission's report, this independent study states that closure would produce a major negative impact on regional sales, employment, income, school enrollment and demand for housing. An extensive study is underway and a thorough regional analysis will be available from the University in 90 days.

As can be expected, the local real estate market in the immediate area surrounding the base is suffering. Only one house has been sold since the proposed closure was announced in late December, and that was due to a family being burned out. Property values have dropped and owners have lost equity. I am in the process of trying to find out how many Chanute-related people own their own homes, how much the Defense Department buyout program is going to cost, and the impact on area savings and loan institutions which hold these mortgages. Even now, the Air Force and the Army Corps of Engineers are trying to estimate how many homes will be required to be purchased and what the cost will be. Because this is not yet known, it could not have been included in the Commission's study.

Particularly hard hit by a closure would be the local school system in the immediate area of the base. Rantoul City Schools will be forced to close 4 of its 6 schools. Elementary school enrollment will drastically decline with a loss of 65 percent of its students. The high school will lose 43 percent of its students. By coincidence, the percentage of teachers required to be released is 65 percent in the elementary schools and 43 percent in the high schools. This is not a moderate impact.

Among the total 13 affected school districts, 39 percent of its students will be lost, $1.7 million in federal income and $3.6 million in state income.

Because of the average age of local teaching faculties and the economic pressures on all schools in Illinois, over half of the tenured teachers who will be released will have too much experience to be reemployed as teachers in Illinois. These are teachers with more than 10 years experience. With the Illinois Teacher Retirement System requiring 20 years of credit to receive significant benefits, all of these career teachers are facing an extraordinarily difficult future.

The Commission report cites an $8 million savings by closing the Willard Airport in Campaign/Urbana and moving this civilian airport to Chanute. I would like to point out that there are no facilities—no tower, lights or radar—at Chanute. The airport they would close is fully operational with ILS, radar, a 10,000 foot runway, where $88 million has been spent in the past five years. It has an existing passenger terminal, and a new terminal is under construction. None of these facilities and equipment exist at Chanute.

Although Chanute is the third oldest installation and the oldest technical training center in the Air Force, it has been continuously changing to meet the needs of modern day life and technology. Major improvements have been made over the past ten years. Nearly $150 million in capital improvements have been made. These include a new commissary; two new dormitories for unaccompanied officers, one of which is 50 percent complete; a new unaccompanied enlisted dormitory with dining hall; renovation of four dormitories for enlisted students; upgraded military family housing; a $3.3 million gymnasium; an arts and crafts center; a youth center; a branch exchange shoppette; a branch exhange gas station; a base recreational lake and park; a new fire protection training complex; expansion of the jet engine training facility; cold storage facility; a new weather training facility; liquid fuels training facility; energy conservation investment program; heat plant emission control; data processing facility and the upgrade of steam lines for the central heating plant.

The Commission states that closing Chanute will save $68.7 million annually. From my figures, that equals the amount needed to operate and maintain the base each year plus the cost of family housing. But, what will it really cost to close Chanute?

According to an article in the Air Force Times (January 23, 1989), Chanute would be the second costliest base to close, requiring the expenditure of $186.4 million at four other bases. The Air Force Times provided the following breakout of this exorbitant expense: Beginning in early 1990, Sheppard AFB, Texas, would receive $82 million for construction projects; Goodfellow AFB, Texas, would receive $35.4 million in construction projects; Keesler AFB, Mississippi, would receive $13.2 million in construction projects; and Lowry AFB, Colorado, would receive $55.8 million in construction projects. I do not believe that spending $186.4 million to save $68.7 million makes any fiscal sense. Other available data reflects $240 million in new construction costs. What is the true cost?

There are other major factors which I feel will have a strong bearing on any possible cost savings, and I have requested the General Accounting Office to investigate the following.

There is a joint military/civilian regional sewage treatment agreement between Chanute and the Village of Rantoul. What would be the buyout costs associated with the Air Force terminating this agreement?

The Air Force has entered into a contract with the Sun Law Energy Corporation for steam to heat approximately 120 of the base's 871 buildings. The terms of the agreement with Sun Law require them to furnish, install, own, operate and maintain the steam plant. The Air Force is committed to purchase steam from Sun Law as a utility for a period of 27 years through the year 2017.

According to the information I received from the Department of the Air Force in May 1988, should Chanute be closed, the contract states specific amounts the Government would be obligated to pay Sun Law in the event of cancellation prior to the year 2011. In 1988, the amount would be $4,500,000; in 1989, it would be $44,278,000; and $84,278,000 in 1990. In each year thereafter, the amount would decrease by approximately approximately $2-$7 million. The plant is to be fully complete in 1990, resulting in the highest termination cost for that year.

How much will it cost to move Chanute courses, personnel and equipment to the recommended receiving bases?

Relocation of major Chanute units and related support activities has been recommended to go the Sheppard, Keesler, Lowry, and Goodfellow AFBs. What are the new construction costs required in the areas of housing, instructional facilities, medical and recreation required to enable these receiving bases to accommodate the transfers from Chanute?

How much is it estimated that the Department of Defense will have to pay under the home buyout program?

There are three civilian contracts at Chanute: Food Service, Maintenance Squadron, and Base Motor Pool. What are the termination costs of buying out these three contracts, which employ 800 civilian personnel who are not government employees?

Another major concern I have involves the hazardous material asbestos. Chanute has 871 buildings and the probability of many of these buildings containing asbestos is high. If the base is closed and these buildings are not cleaned up, which I understand is a very expensive process, then they may very well be rendered useless.

Madam Chairwoman, for national security reasons, I do not have any faith in a report that recommends closure of the only base which provides Minuteman missile maintenance training. I do not have any faith in a report that so falsely states that there would only be a moderate economic impact. This rural Illinois community is fighting for its very life, and I am committed to this fight.

I have been denied basic information on the rationale for Chanute closure recommendation. I have been forced to file Freedom of Information requests with both the Base Closure Commission and the Department of the Air Force. To date, neither the Commission or the department has been able to provide me with a direct answer to a very simple question: What is the justification for the closure recommendation for Chanute? I cannot get any straight answers. There is no accountability.

I think it is clear that there will not be any cost savings achieved in the event Chanute AFB is indeed closed. It is impossible to recover those costs of building new specialized facilities and moving personnel and equipment to other bases from the savings alleged to be achieved from the closing of Chanute.

I have provided a film on Chanute, which I hope the subcommittee will be able to view. At this time, I extend a personal invitation once again to you, Madam Chairwoman, and to all members of the subcommittee, to come with me to Chanute for a tour of this facility.

Chanute is an experienced, top caliber facility with proven dedication to high quality training. It is accomplishing its mission and should be allowed to continue to do so.

The Air Force estimates that the closing of Chanute and the moving of the equipment can result in a six-month period when these training courses will not be taught since they are base specific, hands-on courses and the training equipment necessary for instruction in these courses does not exist at any other facility.

In summary, the cost of new construction at receiving installations, the cost of moving personnel and facilities from Chanute, the cost of the housing buyout, the steam plant, the sewage plant, and the asbestos cleanup all make savings in a six year timeframe by closing Chanute impossible.

My constituents have all this information. They know that Chanute should not be on this list. At this point, I can only ask the subcommittee members what advice they have for me in responding to the concerns of the people I represent.

COMMITTEE PROCESS REFORMS OF 1989

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing the "Committee Process Reforms of 1989," a package of 14 amendments to House rules designed to revitalize our committee system.

The acronym for "committee process reforms" is CPR, and that's exactly what our atrophied committee system needs—a little cardiopulmonary resuscitation. Committees are supposed to constitute the very heart of the legislative process. And yet today they are suffering from hardened arteries, clogged valves and tangled veins, making it extremely difficult for the well-regulated and healthy flow of legislation.

My colleagues are well familiar with the reasons for the decline of our committee system. Committees have been squeezed out by the budget and appropriations process, entangled in the proliferation of subcommittees and turf battles, and forced by 3-day workweeks and Members' multiple committee and subcommittee assignments to resort to miniquorums and ghost-voting. Not only are committees not able to complete their routine authorization work, but they are not even attempting to conduct any kind of systematic oversight of laws, programs and agencies already in existence.

LEGISLATIVE OUTPUT

One might think that committees are unable to complete their work because they are overburdened with more legislation than ever before. But such a hypothesis is not borne out by the facts. As table 1 demonstrates, in the 100th Congress, the number of public bills reported by House committees was 718, 48 percent fewer than the 90th Congress and 31 percent fewer than the 95th Congress. The House passed 1,061 measures in the 100th Congress, 12.5 percent fewer than 20 years ago, but 3.3 percent more than 10 years ago.

Looking at this data in another way, whereas 20 years ago the ratio of measures reported to measures passed was 1.12, and 10 years ago was 1.02, in the 100th Congress the ratio was 0.68. In other words, for every three measures we pass, only two have been reported.

The number of public measures enacted was actually up in the 100th Congress at 713, 11.4 percent more than 20 years ago and 12.6 percent more than 10 years ago. This figure, however, is somewhat deceptive when you consider that so-called commemorative bills comprised 36 percent of the public laws in the 100th Congress compared to 5.3 percent in the 90th and 8.2 percent in the 95th. When one weeds out the commemorative legislation, we are left with only 455 substantive enactments in the 100th Congress compared with 606 in the 90th and 581 in the 95th.

SUBCOMMITTEES AND STAFF

One of the most dramatic developments of the past two decades has been the tremendous growth in House subcommittees and staff. While bolstering congressional staff and resources was seen as a long overdue reform to give the Congress a more coequal status with the executive branch, there comes a time when we reach a point of diminishing returns—we end up with more staff and subcommittees than our finite number of 435 Members can manage or absorb.

As table 1 shows, the number of subcommittees in the House has increased from 114 to 157 over the last 20 years, a 37.7-percent incease, and the number of committee staff from 629 to 2,087, a 231-percent increase. Committee costs over that same period have risen from $165 million per Congress to $1.13 billion, a 585-percent increase.

It's all well and good that over half the majority Members have their own little fiefdoms and can go by the title of "chairman," but it's quite another thing to make that sprawling system of subcommittees and staff work for the good of the whole. A survey of House Members by the Center for Responsive Politics last year reveals that 67.8 percent think the number of subcommittees should be reduced. And roughly half the Members think more stringent limits should be placed on subcommittee staff and Member subcommittee assignments.

In short, Mr. Speaker, Members recognize the need for a leaner, more streamlined committee system if it is to be made to work effectively in the future.

MEMBER ASSIGNMENTS

Not only does the proliferation of subcommittees contribute to institutional and legislative fragmentation, but it strains the capacities of Members to do a conscientious job. It is not unusual to hear Members complain that they are simultaneously scheduled for three or more committee or subcommittee meetings or hearings each day.

Some decide to give one such hearing or meeting priority over the others. Other Members try to spend a little bit of time in each, in part to register their attendance, and in part to get at least some flavor of what's going on. But seldom do any of us feel that we are responsibly fulfilling our roles on any one of these units given the conflicting demands being made on our limited time.

As table 2 below indicates, the mean number of committee and subcommittee assignments per House Member has gradually increased from about 5 in the 90th Congress, 20 years ago, to 6.3 in the 95th Congress, 10 years ago, to 6.95 in the 100th Congress (1987–88).

Is it any wonder that Members often feel they are on a treadmill and look back at the end of a long and exhausting day and wonder what they really learned or accomplished on that day? I recall one survey which found that the average House Member worked an 11-hour day, of which 11 minutes were devoted to reading and thinking. One Member reacted, only half jokingly, "I wonder who is using my 11 minutes?" It might be funnier if it weren't so true.

SPECIAL RULES AND RATIOS

As I previously mentioned, one of the reasons committees are declining is that Members have so many committee, subcommittee and other responsibilities that they cannot devote sufficient time to any one legislative assignment. As a result of our limited workweek and multiple assignments, committees have been permitted under House rules to conduct business with as few as one-third of their Members present. The exception to this is the reporting of a measure, for which at least half the members must be present. And committees are authorized to adopt committee rules which permit proxy voting.

As can be seen in table 2, 18 of our 27 standing and select committees permit one-third quorums, while only nine do not. And 22 of our standing and select committees permit proxy voting while only 5 prohibit it.

[7] The Committees on Appropriations and Budget receive no investigative staff funds and instead are funded entirely through the appropriations process under an an open-ended statutory authorization.

Another problem in reporting representative legislation is the unrepresentative party ratios on some committees. Table 3 shows that while Democrats comprised 59 percent of House membership in the 100th Congress, they held an average of 61 percent of standing and select committee seats, and that includes the Standards Committee which has a 50–50 majority-minority party makeup. If one looks at the staffing on committees, the majority party edge is even more dramatic: 76 percent to 24 percent. An even more telling statistic on committee staff is the number of staff per committee member. While the average ratio is 1.9 to 1, one committee has 3.6 staffers per member, and two others have 3.5 staffers per member.

MULTIPLE REFERRALS

Another factor which delays and complicates the legislative process is the system of referring bills to two or more committees having overlapping jurisdictions. The Speaker was first given this authority in the Committee Reform Amendments of 1974, and it first became effective in 1975.

While the original intent of the Bolling committee in its committee reform package was to realign committee jurisdictions along more rational and functional lines so that multiple referrals would be held to a minimum, the Democratic caucus substitute for the bipartisan package scuttled jurisdictional reform while retaining multiple referrals.

One early assessment of the multiple referral system indicated that multiple referred bills took four times as long to process in committees as singly referred bills, only half the chance of being reported, and only one-third the chance of being passed by the House.

More recent data (see table 5) indicates that things have improved for multiple referred bills. They actually have a higher chance of being reported—in part because so many singly reported measures are taken-up without being reported. But, they still have close to one-third the chance as singly referred bills of being passed—again, in part, for the same reason.

Reprinted from, "One Bill, Many Committees: Multiple Referrals in the U.S. House of Representatives," by Roger H. Davidson, Walter J. Oleszek, and Thomas Kephart, in "Legislative Studies Quarterly", vol. 13, Feb., 1988.

Most committees have adjusted to this shared jurisdiction situation, and, in many cases, the cross-fertilization process has been healthy for policymaking in the House. But, at the same time, it must be admitted that multiple referrals also result in considerable duplication of effort, not to mention the valuable consumption of time that might better be spent on other jurisdictional areas. It is clear from the discussion in the next section of my special order that committees are failing to do some of their most basic work, and this is in part due to the time spent on multiply referred legislation.

THE AUTHORIZATION BREAKDOWN

Mr. Speaker, the complaint that we are always slow in enacting authorization bills is not a new one. The Appropriations Committee has been coming to the Rules Committee as a routine matter on most of its bills over the last two decades, requesting a waiver of clause 2, rule 21, against numerous provisions in each bill. As my colleagues are aware, clause 2 states that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any General appropriation bill, or shall be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

In the past the point was often made that the authorization bill in question had passed the House but had not yet passed the Senate, or cleared the conference committee. But, this claim, is being made less and less. The fact is that fewer authorizations are even being reported, let alone being considered by the House. And yet, we still grant the necessary waivers on the appropriations bills, and fund the unauthorized agencies and programs anyway.

Fiscal year 1988 may have been the worst of all time in terms of unauthorized appropriations. According to a CBO report, that omnibus continuing resolution we enacted in 1987 contained nearly $45 billion in funding for some 45 unauthorized laws.

But, even when we returned to the more normal way of doing things last year, and passed all 13 appropriations bills separately, we were still not coming anywhere near enacting all the necessary authorization bills. As table 6 below shows, we approached fiscal year 1989 with 97 laws which required authorizations worth approximately $277 billion. But, when we completed our work for fiscal 1989, nearly one-third of those laws, for which some $23 billion had been appropriated, had still not been reauthorized. Table 6, which is derived from CBO data, shows the breakdown by House Committee for those unauthorized programs.

The breakdown of our authorizing process has even led some, such as former CBO Director Alice Rivlin, to propose that the authorization and appropriations committees be merged to avoid the duplication and delays caused by our three-track budget system. Even the President's National Economic Commission, in its March 1, 1989, report, has not only called for a Joint Budget Committee to force earlier and better coordinated budget action, but, to quote from the report, went on to recommend the following:

Some method should be found to reduce the duplication inherent in the present system of separate authorization and appropriation committees. (p. 11)

WHAT SHOULD BE DONE?

Mr. Speaker, I don't think we need to merge authorizing and appropriation committees to make our system work again. Instead of a radical overhaul of House structure and procedures, we should think in terms of restoring our existing committee system to its rightful working role as the heart of the legislative process. That's what my Committee Process Reforms, or CPR, is all about—getting that heart pumping again.

To do this, we must first cut back on the number of subcommittees, Member assignments, and staff. I have proposed no more than six subcommittee assignments per Member, and a 10-percent overall reduction in committee staff.

To make our committees truly working and representative entities, we must require early organization of committees, enforce equitable party ratios, abolish proxy voting, and restore majority quorums for doing business.

To make the work of our committees more manageable and less duplicative, I have proposed the elimination of joint referrals of bills to two or more committees, while retaining sequential referrals, subject to time limits.

To induce our committees to get their work done early, I am proposing the restoration of the May 15 deadline for reporting authorizations. And, to make it more difficult for unreported bills to come to the floor, I am proposing a two-thirds consideration vote on any rule which provides for the consideration of an unreported bill.

Finally, I am proposing that Congress once again get serious about its oversight responsibilities by requiring each House committee to formally adopt an oversight agenda at the beginning of each Congress, and to ensure that its long term review of laws, agencies and programs within its jurisdiction be conducted in a more systematic manner.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I don't pretend for a moment that my little package of 14 House rules amendments will restore our committee system overnight. But, I do think it can provide a valuable start in that direction. Ultimately, like so many other things, procedural changes alone will not turn the tide; it will require the political will of Members to make our system work better. But, it is my hope that the reforms I have proposed, together with other proposals, will at least point the way. And maybe, just maybe, where there is a way, there is a will.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I include a paragraph-by-paragraph summary of my committee process reforms. The summary follows:

H. RES. 106, SUMMARY OF "COMMITTEE PROCESS REFORMS OF 1989"

(A resolution introduced by Representative Lynn Martin to amend House Rules "to restore the committee system to its rightful role in the legislative process.")

Sec. 1. Title: "Committee Process Reforms of 1989."

Sec. 2. (a) House Rules would be amended as follows:

(1) Oversight Reform—Committees would be required to formally adopt and submit to the House Administration Committee by March 1st of the first session their oversight plans for that Congress. The House Administration Committee, after consultation with the majority and minority leaders, would report the plans to the House by March 15th together with its recommendations, and those of the joint leadership group to assure coordination between committees. The Speaker would be authorized to appoint ad hoc oversight committees for specific tasks from the membership of committees with shared jurisdiction. Committees would be required to include an oversight section in their final activity report at the end of a Congress.

(2) Multiple Referral of Legislation—The joint referral of bills to two or more committees would be abolished, while split and sequential referrals would be retained, subject to time limits and designation by the Speaker of a committee of principal jurisdiction.

(3) Committee Elections and Organization—Committees would be elected not later than seven legislative days after the convening of a new Congress and must organize not later than three legislative days thereafter.

(4) Committee Ratios—The party ratios on committees would be required to reflect that of the full House (except for Standards of Official Conduct which is bipartisan). The requirement would extend to select and conference committees as well.

(5) Subcommittee Limits—No committee (except appropriations) could have more than six subcommittees, and no Member could have more than four subcommittee assignments.

(6) Proxy Voting Ban—All proxy voting on committees would be prohibited.

(7) Open Meetings—Committee meetings could only be closed by majority vote for national security, personal privacy, or personnel reasons.

(8) Majority Quorums—A majority of the membership of a committee would be required for the transaction of any business.

(9) Report Accountability—The names of those voting for and against reporting measures shall be included in the committee report, and, if a measure is reported on a non-recorded vote, the names of those members actually present shall instead be listed in the committee report.

(10) Prior Availability of Draft Report—A draft committee report must be made available to members at least one legislative day prior to its consideration.

(11) Committee Documents—Committee documents intended for public dissemination, other than factual materials, must either be voted on by the committee and opportunity afforded for additional views, or must carry a disclaimer on their cover that they have not been approved by the committee and do not necessarily reflect the views of its members.

(12) Unreported Bills—It would not be in order, except by two-thirds vote, to consider a rule in the House on a bill that has not been reported from committee.

(13) Committee Staffing—Committee funding resolutions could not be considered until the House has first adopted a resolution from the House Administration Committee setting an overall limit on committee staffing for the session. The minority would be entitled to up to one-third of the investigative staff funds, on request. The overall committee staff limit for the 101st Congress could not be more than 90% of the total at the end of the 100th Congress.

(14) Authorization Reporting Deadline—Committees would be required to report authorization bills not later than May 15 preceding the beginning of the fiscal year to which they apply.

(b) Effective Date: The provisions of the resolution shall take effect upon adoption, so far as they are applicable.

SHELBYVILLE EAGLETTES ACHIEVE UNDEFEATED SEASON

(Mr. COOPER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to praise the achievements of the No. 1 ranked high school girls basketball team in America—the Shelbyville, TN, Golden Eaglettes.

This outstanding team won the Tennessee high school championship last Saturday night, completing a perfect 36-0 season. They are currently ranked No. 1 in the country by USA Today. Coach Rick Insell and his assistants have done a remarkable job again this season, and I congratulate everyone associated with the team. I cannot overstate how proud Shelbyville feels for our girls basketball team.

Mr. Speaker, we often read sad stories about leading athletes in college and high school who fail to make progress in the classroom. That's why I'm especially proud of the Shelbyville girls tradition of excellence both on and off the court. There are four seniors on this year's team with a perfect 4.0 grade point average, and the team's cumulative GPA is an impressive 3.43.

These girls are top scholar athletes who know what hard work and dedication means. They deserve our admiration and praise.

I would like to add the following article taken from the sports pages of the Tennessean on March 8:

SHELBYVILLE: QUEENS OF THE COURT

(By Larry Taft)

SHELBYVILLE, TENN.—As they stroll through the hallways going from one class to another, players on the Shelbyville Central High School girls basketball team are quite inconspicuous.

They chat with male and female friends, and gossip much the same as girls at any other high school do.

Yet, when they take the basketball court, they command the spotlight. When the Tennessee Secondary School Athletic Association Girls State Basketball Tournament opens in Murfreesboro today, Shelbyville's team will be the main attraction.

Ranked No. 1 in the nation by USA Today, the Golden Eaglettes have embarked on an odessy that is expected to culminate in a Class AAA state championship Saturday night. Winning has become so commonplace that a game closer than 15 points bring "Ooos" and "Ahhhs" from their legions of fans and hope for the detractors who relish the Eaglettes' fall from their lofty perch.

But what few of the thousands who are tracking Shelbyville's girls realize is that their basketball success is matched in the classroom. All seven seniors associated with the team—players Misty Lamb, Lynda Motes, Mitzi Rice, Angela Mullins and managers Scarlett Bonds Nicole Campbell and Lori Jones—are National Honor Society members. The teams' cumulative grade point average is 3.43 with a 3.59 in the fall semester. Senior players had a 4.0 during the fall.

So outstanding has been the work in the classroom that one wonders if the academic and athletic success are related. Senior guard Lynda Motes says the two go hand in hand. "If you play basketball, you have to pass," said Motes, who ranks near the top of her class with an academic load that includes honors and advanced courses.

"Sometimes you can try playing too smart. You have a work at channeling your thinking ability in the right direction, but that doesn't mean you take time to think about each thing you do when you're playing.

"We know not many players are going to get scholarships. If I get a scholarship, it will be academic, not athletic."

Rice, who has already signed a scholarship with Tennessee Tech, still puts her stock in a degree and good grades.

"No matter how good you are, you're not going to play basketball the rest of your life," Rice said. "The reason we go to school is to get an education. Basketball is just part of our total education."

Mrs. Ardis Rittenberry, the school's National Honor Society sponsor, also works as an academic adviser for the team. A former cheerleader sponsor, Rittenberry oversees the academic progress of each player, arranging for tutoring for those who falter.

"I want to help everyone with the team do the best they can, and our other students feel the same way," Rittenberry said.

"When a player has trouble in a classroom setting, one of the students who is an honor society member will work in a free period, giving them one-on-one help."

Senior Sonya Harris is just such a student.

"As a student, I'm proud of the team and what they have meant to our school," Harris said. "When they were featured on ESPN, I got excited. We're proud to have our school recognized. I don't think there is any jealousy. We all are proud of each other."

Teacher Joan Gray, who counts Motes among her honors English pupils, said that in just one year at the school she had seen many admirable qualities in the nature of the players.

"They have a self-confidence and competitiveness that is unique. They have the belief that they can do anything if they put forth enough effort and work hard enough," Gray said, see that same spirit in the classroom that's exhibited on the playing floor.

Undoubtedly, basketball at Shelbyville is special. The Eaglettes are the Sweethearts of the Hardwood in Bedford Country. There is extraordinary admiration, so much so that Lamb says it's difficult to explain Eaglette basketball to outsiders.

"It's like a family of good country girls who will get after anybody who comes after us, and we have fans that will follow us anywhere," said Lamb the state's Class AAA Miss Basketball and the leading academian among the seniors.

"We love our fans and they love us. I remember that in December when we were in Altoona [Pa.] for the tournament up there, this little boy who is a big, big fan came up to us and told us it was his birthday. He said all he wanted was an Eaglette win. After we won, he was so happy. It was the most heart-warming thing I've ever been through."

Principal Mike Bone says this Shelbyville team is different from the rest.

"I wouldn't say they're more well-rounded, but they have more stability," Bone said. "They're considerably more serious in every area. And thats the way they play, too.

"It doesn't bother them when they are on television or have reporters here. They take everything in stride and don't flaunt their prestige. They're low key, very methodical."

The team's oneness isn't limited to starters. Mullins, a reserve, says the team is together as one.

"Coach [Rick] Insell says we are all one team, that we have no stars and that we are a family," Mullins said.

"That's the way we all look at it. We work together as one, helping each other with our studies, just as we help when we're playing. We love each other like sisters."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

MICHAEL A. PELAVIN, NJCRAC IMMEDIATE PAST PRESIDENT

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the honor of attending the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council's plenum luncheon honoring my dear friend—and NJCRAC's immediate past president—Michael A. Pelavin. Mr. Pelavin delivered an address at the luncheon that I believe to be worthy of our attention and thoughtful consideration.

TO BUILD A BETTER AMERICA: THE UNFINISHED AGENDA OF THE JEWISH COMMUNITY—ADDRESS BY MICHAEL A. PELAVIN

In his moving acceptance speech at the Republican National Convention last August, George Bush told us that he's a quiet man, but "one who hears the quiet people others don't." What a wonderful aspiration for a President! And how difficult a task!

I want to take a moment at the outset of my remarks to help give voice to some of those quiet people, to some of our fellow citizens whose voices are not being heard.

Listen to the voice of Shamal Jackson who lived only eight months. By the time he died in New York City from low birth weight, poor nutrition, and viral infection, Shamal had never slept in an apartment or house. He had slept in shelters with strangers, in hospitals, in welfare hotels, in the welfare office and in subways which he and his mother rode late at night when there was no place else to go.

Listen to the voice of Terri from Redwood City, California. The mother of two, Terri has donated blood to get a little extra money to buy food for her children. Without a job or an apartment, Terri once went four days without food while searching for shelter for herself and her children.

Hear the voice of Betty Stevens, an only child, solely responsible for her chronically-ill elderly parents. Ms. Stevens cared for her mother and father for eight years until their deteriorating conditions forced her to place them in a nursing home. As the expenses continued to mount, Ms. Stevens had no choice but to sell her parents' home of 51 years to meet these costs. "To find myself hoping they do not survive beyond the time their funds can cover their expenses is devastating."

Listen also to the voice of Phillip Williams, a Jewish man, homeless, living on the streets of Baltimore. "Sometimes," he says, "I feel like the Jewish community of this city is willing to pump money for causes such as the homeless, and that's fine. But," Mr. Williams asks, "how many have been willing to take the time to know anyone who is homeless?"

These are not isolated stories. They are simply four voices, voices which need to be heard. And if we—the Jewish Community Relations field—do not hear them, who will? If we, in effect, will not be their voice, who will?

II.

The challenge facing the community relations field today—and tomorrow—is to discover whether we as a community are ready once again to assume the responsibility for arousing what is best in the American people: their compassion, their understanding, their commitment to justice and equality for all people. Are we ready to renew America's commitment to eliminating the inequities that still exist in this land of plenty?

There is still a domestic community relations agenda, a pressing, demanding, seemingly intractable series of issues and claims that confront our nation—and our own community—with its most serious challenge. Crucial battles for legal equality have been won, but the facts of social inequality remain.

With all the hoop-la about America's "economic recovery," the gap between rich and poor is now wider than at any time since the Census Bureau began collecting such data. The United States is increasingly becoming two societies—one rich, one poor. What does that say for our hopes about the health of American democracy? Nearly 32,000,000 Americans live at or near the poverty line. More than 20% of all children, and half of all black and Hispanic youngsters—some 13,000,000 young people—live in poverty. Two to 3,000,000 Americans are homeless altogether. Thirty-seven million Americans have no health insurance. More than half the babies born to teenagers are born out of wedlock. Seventeen percent of white families and 56% of black families are headed by single women.

Last month, the U.S. Conference of Mayors released the findings of a study on hunger and homelessness in 27 American cities. Among its conclusions, the report found that, requests for emergency food assistance increased in nearly 90% of the survey cities, by an average of about 20%. More than three out of five persons seeking emergency food assistance in the survey cities are members of families—both children and parents.

With the decline in federally-assisted housing programs, none of the survey cities expect to meet the housing needs of low income household for the foreseeable future. Shelters in two out of three of the survey cities must turn away homeless families because of lack of resources. In nearly three-fourths of these cities, emergency shelters must turn away other homeless people because of lack of resources.

And the plague of drugs, with attendant crime and other social pathologies, bespeaks the alienation, anger, and despair that coldly embrace growing numbers of the so-called underclass. Do we not have an obligation to help these men, women and children—our fellow Americans—overcome this legacy of need and achieve self-sufficiency?

The Jewish community itself is not immune from serious domestic problems. Jews are threatened with falling through gaping holes in the "safety net." The city of Chicago has identified 36,000 Jews as "economically vulnerable." Philadelphia's population study found over 1,000 Jewish households receiving some form or another of public assistance. The median age of the Jewish community—at 39, and 20% higher than society at large—suggests that we need to confront the frightfully costly problem of long-term home and health care for the elderly. It is estimated that the cost of keeping an individual in a nursing home in America is approaching $30,000 a year. How many among us can afford to care for our parents at that price? Yet who among us is prepared to see our parents not receive the best possible care regardless of price?

Recent studies reveal that the Jewish community shares with society at large growing instances of drug abuse, child abuse, and developmental disabilities. And CJF reports that federal cutbacks in meeting a variety of direct needs has led many federations to respond by restoring cash assistance lines to their budgets. In meeting these needs, however, other requests for communal support must go unheeded.

III.

The American Jewish Community has always been in the forefront of the struggle for social justice. It is not hubris on our part to recall the role of the Jewish community relations field as the conscience of the communities—our own and the broader one in which we live. But why is the Jewish community there? Why has the Jewish community continued to be counted in that fight?

Answers to these questions are as many and varied as the people in this room today. But I am sure that we would agree to certain things. First, about history. Our immigrant forebears found in America not a golden land, but a golden opportunity. In America, it seemed, everyone was from somewhere else. The land bubbled with excitement and possibility. With faith in oneself, one might succeed.

I am a product of that migration. My father came to this country in 1922 from White Russia; my mother arrived from Budapest in 1912. One of my grandfathers peddled milk from a horse-drawn wagon, and my father sold newspapers in his effort to help the family. By the time they died, their families had joined them, their children were educated, and the dreams that they had shaped for themselves here in America had come into being and their hopes were fulfilled.

But my parents and yours brought something else, seeds that took root in American ground though not native to it: our collective Jewish Consciousness—a history and an ethic—that to this day enables us to understand what is truly important to our security, to our sense of self and our sense of place. We have been imprinted with the mark of history. We are heirs of the Holocaust, the persecuted of the pogroms, the ancient scapegoats of alien lands. The tragedies and glories of our past unite us, and with the creation of the State of Israel we know that we never again shall depend on the kindness of strangers to secure our future, for we now have our own land. And because Israel plays that role for us, we will never compromise on the central issue of her right to exist as a creative, viable, democratic society and on her unsparing efforts to apply her strength in the search for a just and enduring peace.

Strengthened by our hopes for America and tempered by the lessons of our group history, the Jewish community has largely succeeded in this country. Among all American religious groups, Jews have the highest level of family income and educational attainment. We are leaders in the learned professions, academia, and the arts. We are prominent in public affairs.

Our material success and our political behavior are puzzling to many. Why is it, we are asked, that Jews vote more like disadvantaged minorities than like our socio-ecomomic peers? Some, including some Jews, wonder if Jewish interest would not be better served if we "voted our pocketbooks."

I disagree. Such a view is shortsighted; it misreads our understanding of what is required to assure our continuing security in American society. When Ronald Reagan asked and George Bush echoed, "Are you better off today than you were eight years ago," the Jewish community answered not individually, but collectively. While many of us may indeed be better off financially today than in 1980, we dispute the premise of the question. We ask instead, "What is the state of America today as compared to eight years ago? What assistance has been offered to the poor, the homeless and the unemployed among us? What is being done to meet the needs of the vast majority of American citizens in health care, child care, and housing?"

It ought not be surprising that a community whose central questions are these should continue to vote for candidates who share its view that assisting the needy is a principal function of government. We vote not out of a personal history stretching back ten or twenty years, but out of 2,000 years of Jewish experience which has ingrained in us an understanding that conditions threatening to the fundamental rights of any individual in society jeopardize the rights of all. We remember the words of Rabbi Stephen Wise, who taught us that "only in a land where the rights of all are secure are the rights of Jews secure." And we remember that the freedoms embodied in the Bill of Rights—of speech, assembly, press, worship, and the right to petition the government—must always be protected, for they are the very bedrock of the society in which we have flourished.

We have consistently applied these principles in our practice. Early on, the Jewish community understood that coalition building is the soundest strategy for a minority—any minority, including our own—to achieve its political objectives. With workers from around the world, our forebears struggled for labor unions to bring justice and equity to the work place. With blacks in Alabama, grape growers in California, wherever injustice cried out for witness, the Jewish community stood shoulder to shoulder with other "weak clients" seeking redress of grievances. And from these common, pragmatic efforts came the relationships that have been translated not only into a shared, general vision of America but also into broad support for our particular concerns: Israel's survival and the rights of Soviet Jews to rejoin their people in freedom.

We acknowledged that commitment to common cause nearly fifty years ago in creating NJCRAC as the institutional framework for arriving at and articulating our communal goals and pursuing them on behalf of the common good. The NJCRAC process, I believe, has the flexibility and dynamism to shape the response of the Jewish community relations field to our new challenges. Polls tell us that a vast majority of Jews share the outlook and positions of NJCRAC as reflected in the Joint Program Plan. Too many of these Jews, however, are unidentified with the community. Many are like I was before my involvement in my local federation, a young lawyer involved in organizations like the ACLU who did not fully realize that these efforts on behalf of the broader community actually reflected a Jewish sensibility. The field needs to consciously reach out to these young men and women, recognizing that Jewish community relations provides an important, yet underutilized channel for bringing people into the Jewish community.

Secondly, we must acknowledge that our strategic practice has frequently fallen short of our rhetoric. How many communities are actively, consciously involved in coalition-building? Are we uncovering common agendas with the Blacks, Hispanics, and Asian Americans who are our neighbors and organizing effective coalitions to achieve our shared goals. The automatic liberal coalition of the thirties. forties, fifties, and sixties no longer exists. The challenge for us, then, is to construct functional coalitions of limited duration, designed to achieve specific goals. We see such coalitions coming together frequently in Washington, suggesting models that can be utilized by the field at the local level.

Thirdly, we must acknowledge our own shortcomings. How many of our communities actually confront issues of domestic concern on a day-to-day priority basis? In my view, too many of us have bought the argument that the Jewish community simply cannot afford the resources required to do community relations well. Part of the task ahead is to make it clear that active involvement in the public affairs agenda is a central Jewish enterprise—it protects and preserves American democracy and it builds active strongly-identified Jews. If for no other reason, community relations should be seen as a major community priority.

The JTA Community News Reporter for December 9, 1988 tells of the permanent residence facility operating in Adas Israel Congregation here in Washington, D.C. Housing five women between the ages of 30 and 50, the project was conceived by the synagogue as a model effort to involve the religious community in finding a permanent answer to the problem of homelessness. According to the synagogue's social action chairman, the "potential for expansion is largely in getting other congregations and other organizations to pursue similar programs." The facility is called the Anne Frank House, a name that evokes in us all the realization that the struggle for justice is an unceasing one whose outcome is by no means assured.

This striking example of Jewish involvement in the problem of homelessness stands in sharp contrast to the general absence of such creative programming in the community. To me, it only underscores the existing evidence that we have neglected our relationships. Growing public recognition of tension between Jews and blacks, the pending judicial assault on the principle of reproductive choice embodied in the Supreme Court's 1973 decision in Roe v. Wade, the spectacle of pro-Israel supporters heckled and booed at the Demoratic National Convention are all stark reminders that the work of building bridges to other groups in society must be an ongoing enterprise within the field of Jewish community relations. If we do not involve ourselves in the full range of American life, is it likely that other Americans will not care about what is important to us? If we do not fight against the injustices affecting others, will they fight the injustices affecting us? While ongoing relationships are no guarantee that our viewpoint will prevail, the absence of strong bridges is a guarantee that our position will be vulnerable.

IV.

Hubert Humphrey, certainly an ally whose friendship, loyalty and compassion are revered by everyone in this room, once said that the moral test of a society is how it treats those at the dawn of life, children who are helpless; those in the midday, the healthy who need employment and housing; and those within the shadows, the handicapped, the needy, the other helpless. I would add that the Jewish community ought to be in the forefront of efforts to devise and enact comprehensive programs to break the cycle of generational poverty.

How do we do that? Emergency housing and food programs must be fully funded, not cut; rent subsidies must be restored, not phased out; the minimum wage must be increased; quality child care must be available to all Americans; sound family policy must include the right of people to care for newborn or ill children and dependent elderly parents without risk of job loss; Americans must be able to aspire to home ownership, quality education, a rewarding job, afforable health care. In short, the American dream must be restored as a reality to each American household. And each American must have a household in which to cherish that dream.

Yet these goals cost money, and our country faces a severe deficit. How do we balance the two? I would suggest to you that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is not social policy. While we must recognize that federal deficits are a serious problem, spending cuts in the domestic arena are not the only way to reduce those deficits. There are other options. We can—read my lips!—raise revenue. Opinion polls show that a majority of Americans not only believe that President Bush and the Congress will have to raise taxes, but they also are not averse to tax increases to cope with the deficit. And, of course, I believe that the defense budget should be scrutinized with the same rigor with which the domestic budget has been pared. Whatever approach ultimately followed, the Jewish community relations field has an obligation to debate the issues—as we have at this plenum—and insist that the government address these problems, rather than hide behind ideology masquerading as economic policy.

What is Jewish about that debate and that agenda, we are asked? Everything. As Leonard Fein observes in his recent book, Where Are We?, public affairs allows the Jewish community to enact our particular ethical values. It requires us to test the prophetic vision of our faith against the facts of our society's shortcomings. Responding to injustice is central to our integrity as a people. By fighting for justice we can reaffirm our past and redeem our future. Separation of church and state is a justice and a Jewish issue. Civil rights is a justice issue and Jewish issue. Persecution of blacks in South Africa is a justice issue and a Jewish issue. The rights of children, the needs of the elderly, the survival of our cities and farms, these are all justice issues. They must all be Jewish issues as well. If we want pluralism in our society, then we cannot be singular in our concerns.

At the end of the day after all is said and done, that is at the heart of Jewish community relations. That is what Jewish community relations should be saying clearly and unequivocally. If it cannot say at least that much, then I fear it has nothing Jewish to say at all, because our ethical and moral credo tells us that we must be involved in all these issues as Jews and as Americans. That is our obligation.

Remaining engaged in the affairs of our community is a community relations imperative. As Americans and as Jews, we have no moral or pragmatic choice but to move ahead and re-invest our community with the impulse to confront the incomplete domestic agenda. The need to do so is rooted not only in altruism but also in the knowledge that what is good for America is good for the Jewish community and that the strength of the Jewish community and its ability to survive in freedom bears a direct relationship to the quality of life of those around us. But just as the Jewish community has been concerned for the health of American democracy, the health of American democracy allows us to be concerned about the Jewish community. There is a symbiotic relationship between our community and our country that assures the well-being of each.

Thus, the mission of the community relations field—to safeguard the rights of Jews and assure the strength of American democracy—supports our resolve to work to build a better and more just America. Drawing upon the words of our sages, we may not complete the work, but we may not desist from the effort.

WE MUST DO MORE FOR OUR FAMILIES

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, "Champion of the Great American Family" is an outstanding new book by our distinguished colleague from Colorado, Congresswoman PAT SCHROEDER. Recently an excerpt from her book was published in USA Weekend, which appeared in the Palo Alto (CA) Times Tribune. I ask that it be placed in the RECORD.

The issues our friend PAT SCHROEDER raises are critically important to our Nation's future. As she rightly says family policy is "the Moon-shot legislation of the 1990's"—it is legislation that can inspire our entire country in the next decade as our effort to reach the Moon did in the 1960's. Furthermore, policies that help our American families can be critical for the future success, growth, and well-being of our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to read carefully and consider thoughtfully these important ideas from Congresswoman SCHROEDER:

WE MUST DO MORE FOR OUR FAMILIES

To be successful, a politician has to be good at communicating. There is no better training ground for this skill than your own daily family life. You learn the give-and-take of human relations, how to put things diplomatically—as when I tell my children their rooms look like a bomb went off in a K-mart.

Helping my kids with their homework, arranging for the plumber to fix the washer, figuring out what to do about the raccoons in the attic—all these experiences have kept me grounded as a person. Whatever our public role, it is our family responsibilities and joys that form the core and rootedness of our lives.

I've been pretty open about the problems I've had balancing my life, and I think that has made people less guarded with me. They tell me about their own complicated lives and seem to empathize when I describe the times all the balls I was juggling dropped from the air.

Everywhere I see the relieved reaction when people recognize their own problems in mine. There is so much pressure on families to produce perfect children and be the perfect family; we hate to confess we all harbor doubts about whether we are good parents.

The challenges I faced as a parent have been just as rigorous at those I had to deal with as a congresswoman. Campaigning every two years is tough, but so was seeing my son Scott through his high school football career. Through my experiences as a "football mom," I learned a lesson about politics—the average person doesn't pay a lot of attention.

During the season, I'd wash and dry Scott's practice uniform every night. Once, when our dryer broke (washer-dryer problems have been the bane of my domestic life), I became a regular at the laundromat. Virginia, where we live when not in Denver, was caught up in the governor's race that year and in the laundromat was a brochure for Charles Robb (then lieutenant governor, now senator) that included a photo of him with TV personality Phyllis George. People would look at the picture, then ask their friends, "Who is that with Phyllis George?"

Just as most people don't figure politics into their daily lives, politicians don't factor family issues into their agendas. In one respect, the well-being of the family is the most non-controversial issue in politics. Republicans and Democrats alike claim to be pro-family, never hesitating to mention their personal family values and to display family photographs in campaign literature. But ask most politicians about family policy particulars and they begin to shuffle their feet.

When I first ran for Congress, my opponent in the primary made much of the fact that his wife accompanied him on the campaign trail and that they had 10 children. Then he'd point out that my spouse was not campaigning and that I was not at home with my kids. Jim was not with me because we felt it was better for him to keep the home fires burning. I always wondered who was at home with my opponent's 10 kids.

Such political pontificating remains the norm. The family gap—the difference between what politicians say about families and what they actually do for them—grows larger every campaign season.

It seems to me that one reason candidates don't address family issues is that most of them are insulated from family responsibilities. In lobbying members of Congress about family issues, I've noticed that the ones who "get it" are men who are grandparents and have witnessed the dizzying pace of their children's lives; young men whose generation expects men and women to share child-rearing; and women who have had to balance career and family.

There are also sharp disagreements about what the American family is and should be. Some people have a real need to believe in a family ideal that our economy makes rarer every day: Mom at home, Dad at the factory. Others advocate the two-career household, a family structure not everyone wants. To speak about family issues, politicians first have to define them. That means running the risk of alienating some voters.

Political courage is becoming a rare trait. Politicians increasingly rely on polls and pundits to tell them where the people are. The cloakroom wisdom is, "There go the people. Let's scamper to get in front of them because we're their leaders." Family issues don't confer power on their advocates. Family issues aren't as prestigious as defense and foreign policy.

Wanting the best education for your child, caring for a sick child, trying to get by on a tight budget—these are the concerns of most constituents.

The government should initiate the debate, but if it does not, American families can turn the situation around by taking the offensive. They must deliver a message to their elected leaders that it is time to make family problems a priority issue for action and funding.

Funding seems to cause the most anxiety. People say, "Sure, the family needs more help. But our country can't afford it."

Public enemy No. 1 for American families is the federal deficit. But the answer does not lie in cutting programs that have proved successful. A country's budget is the best reflection of its priorities. Our families are so important that we have got to figure out ways to promote their well-being or we will have to pay much more later for having shirked these responsibilities.

The defense budget is one place we can find money for family initiatives. Recent disclosures about scandalously wasteful and corrupt purchasing point to one way of freeing money. We can reduce the amount of money we spend without sacrificing the quality of our defense.

Waste and cheating are not the only problems. We must also question national priorities. We can no longer afford to bear the burden of defending our allies.

Since 1981, 60 percent of our defense budget has gone to NATO commitments. According to Congressional Budget Office figures, the U.S. annually spends $1,115 per citizen for defense, whereas France spends $511, Britain $488 and West Germany $435. Japan also fails to pull its fair share—it spends a little over $100.

Comparison figures on domestic spending also are shocking. Our allies spend much more per capita for education and health than for defense. Japan spends 10 times as much. No other NATO country assigns a higher budgetary priority to defense than to health and education. We do. We spend more on defense.

Our European allies have some of the most progressive family policies in the world. Whether it is child care, parental leave, or health insurance, their citizens enjoy a wide range of family benefits.

The money that we save our allies by paying for a hefty portion of their defense enables them to enact programs that we Americans do not have and think we can't afford. When I talk with allied leaders about burden-sharing, they say, "If you make us pay more money for defense, we may have to raise taxes or cut services."

"Right," I tell them. "That's exactly what we have had to do in the United States."

It is our children who have paid the price of our astronomical defense budget. Our country has higher rates of infant mortality, teen suicide, divorce, teen pregnancy, and alcohol and drug abuse than most of our allies among the developed nations.

The changes in our country's demographics, family life, and economy make it imperative that our federal government provide leadership on family policy. This isn't a call for big government. Some of the most effective programs include money-saving preventive initiatives, such as childhood immunization.

To ignore the federal government's obligation to its families is to pass up a golden opportunity for this country to soar into the next century. That's why I call family policy the moon-shot legislation of the 1990s—a national challenge that can inspire the entire country, just as getting to the moon did in the '60s.

A national family policy should have three basic goals: to acknowledge the rich diversity of American families; to protect the family's economic well-being; to provide families with flexible ways to meet their economic and social needs.

Government policy cannot be based upon a static definition of the family, but must take into account that Americans live in a variety of family structures. Two-parent family, single-parent family, blended family, extended family, empty-nest family—each comes with stresses and needs. An understanding of this diversity is essential to avoid creating government policy that penalizes families that don't fit in a particular mold.

I have tried to identify those issues that a national family policy must address: fairer treatment in the tax code; family and medical leave; affordable child care; minimum health-care coverage; retirement security; and a right to decide whether, when, and how to have a family. But these will simply remain laudable goals unless we can mobilize a constituency around them.

The coalitions that support work and family issues are out there, but they have not been mobilized to counter the much-better organized forces that currently control access to money and power.

I know how little time parents have, but even so, we need to push for a family lobby so that our voices will be as powerful as those of other groups. It is not hopeless. People who care do make a difference.

Our government and our people should step out front together and make a strong moral and practical commitment to the Great American Family. Our country's future is at stake.

ARE WE STARING THE FUTURE IN THE FACE?

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I don't represent New York City, but I do represent Oakland, CA. Both cities, while a continent apart, have been plagued by a continual battle with drug abuse, the lack of available, affordable drug treatment programs, and the resulting AIDS crisis from intraveneous drug abuse.

Will, a generation from now, a nation look back and condemn our Government's current callous disregard for an entire segment of our population?

How, in a nation of such moral commitment and religious strength, can we stand idly by and do next to nothing?

Anyone who has held a tiny baby in their arms, knowing that this innocent, defenseless baby will soon die from AIDS, recognizes that we must commit ourselves to solving this problem. Anything less than providing available, affordable drug treatment—the best way to attack the AIDS crisis currently plaguing our inner cities—is morally indefensible.

Currently 9 out of 10 of IV drug abusers who seek to pay for affordable treatment are turned away and told to wait for at least 3 to 6 months for an available treatment slot. Can anyone explain how we can allow this?

Do not assume that this is a crisis only in New York, Oakland, or other metropolitan cities—this is happening in your own backyard too. Whether it's Seattle or Miami, San Diego or Bangor, it's happening. It's happening in Dothan, AL; in Butte, MT; in Lubbock, TX. You just don't realize it yet.

Mr. Speaker, the New York Times editorial which follows ought to be required reading for all Members:

THREE PLAGUES

Modern America's Three Plagues blight the South Bronx: poverty, drug addiction and AIDS. The population is now widely infected with a disease that slowly drains the body of control, sight, mind and life. When the administrations of Mayor Edward Koch and Gov. Mario Cuomo are long forgotten, history will surely note that the New York of their era left the poor to rot, in unparalleled numbers, from the cruelest of diseases.

Now there is vivid evidence of just how punishing the AIDS plague has become. Among emergency room patients tested at Bronx-Lebanon Medical Center, 23 percent were found to be infected with the AIDS virus, Bruce Lambert reported recently in The Times. That doesn't necessarily mean a quarter of the South Bronx is infected. Emergency room patients are sicker than the population at large. But it's a horrifying warning.

The people of the South Bronx are mostly black or Hispanic, and poor. Poverty and drug addiction go together. Unable to buy clean needles, heroin addicts share them, thus spreading the blood-borne AIDS virus. Crack houses, where sex is often exchanged for drugs, spur the spread of other diseases, which in turn promote the spread of AIDS. Addicts then infect their partners. In one South Bronx district, 1 of every 25 women giving birth now carries the virus, and nearly half of these infect their babies.

As if the Three Plagues weren't deadly enough, they are magnified by a larger malady: indifference. The poor of the South Bronx do not speak loudly in the councils of state. Other citizens readily see them, if at all, as an underclass, an unregenerate source of addiction and crime.

Society has not, surely, chosen a deliberate policy to let them die. But if it had, the present outcome would not be very different. Governor Cuomo, announcing his five-year plan for combating AIDS, declared last week, "I want to say as clearly as I can, I am not putting into this plan this year nearly enough money to meet these goals realistically."

There is no public health plan to stem the spread of AIDS in the South Bronx, just a grab bag of half-hearted initiatives. If society really cared about the Three Plagues, in every South Bronx across the country, many measures might have been tried long ago:

Drug treatment would be made available on demand, and centers set up where addicts congregate conquering local opposition.

Instead of having to send addicts back on the street when no drug treatment was available, clinics would be allowed to supply them with clean needles. This would help keep an addict coming back until a treatment slot was ready, meanwhile protecting against infection.

Addicts would be urged to avoid sharing needles, to sterilize their works with bleach and to enroll in dirty-for-clean needle exchange programs while awaiting treatment.

Each severely affected block would be assigned a health worker charged with insuring that every resident understood how to protect himself against contracting AIDS.

Once the victims of AIDS are dying, with only months to live, public expenditure soars, often reaching $100,000 per case. Were a fraction of the same money available for prevention, many lives would be saved.

Without a serious preventive effort, the incidence of AIDS in the South Bronx will soon approach that in African cities with minimal standards of public health. And the levels in other inner cities won't be far behind, to the enduring shame of all New York and of all America.

TRIBUTE TO UKRAINIAN PEOPLE

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, today, I wish to pay tribute to the Ukrainian people who remain committed to their struggle for sovereignty and independent statehood. This year marks the 70th anniversary of the unification of Ukrainian lands in the Ukrainian National Republic. On January 22, 1918, in the city of Kiev, the Ukrainian Central Rada issued a proclamation declaring Ukraine a free, independent nation, subordinated to no other foreign power and a member of the community of free nations. Unfortunately for the people of Ukraine the iron fists of Soviet leader after Soviet leader, including the present General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev, have subjugated these brave peoples. In tribute, and recognition of their rights of political, economic, and religious freedom, I wish to submit into the RECORD the fourth universal issued on that January day 70 years ago.

FOURTH UNIVERSAL OF JANUARY 22, 1918, PROCLAIMING THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE UKRAINIAN NATIONAL REPUBLIC

People of Ukraine: By your strength, will, and word a Free Ukrainian National Republic was established on the Ukrainian Land. The former old dream of your fathers, fighters for freedom and the rights of the working people has come true.

But the freedom of Ukraine was reborn in a difficult hour. Four years of vicious war have weakened our country and the population. Factories are not producing goods, works at the plants are coming to a stand still, the railroads are dislocated, the money is losing its value, the bread has grown scarcer—hunger is approaching. Bands of robbers and thieves sprang up throughout the country, especially when Russian troops pulled back from the front, causing carnage, disorder and ruin in our land.

For these various reasons the elections to the Ukrainian Constituent Assembly could not take place at the time designated by our previous Universal and the meeting designed for this day could not be held so that the Assembly could take over from us the temporary revolutionary authority in Ukraine, to establish order in our National Republic, and to organize a new government.

In the meantime, the Petrograd Government of People's Commissars, in order to place the free Ukrainian Republic under its authority, has declared war against Ukraine and is dispatching troops into our land—the Red Guard, the Bolsheviks who rob bread from our peasants and carry it off to Russia without any compensation, not sparing even the grain prepared for planting; they kill innocent people and everywhere they spread disorder, thievery, and chaos.

We, the Ukrainian Central Rada, made every effort to avoid the fratricidal war between the two neighboring nations but the Petrograd government did not do likewise and continues the bloody fight with our people and the Republic. Furthermore, the very same Petrograd Government of People's Commissars is delaying the peace efforts and calls for a new war, naming it "holy," Once more the blood will flow, again the unfortunate working people are to lay down their lives.

We, the Ukrainian Central Rada, elected by the congresses of peasants, workers, and soldiers of Ukraine, cannot agree to this and will not support any war because the Ukrainina Nation desires peace and a democratic peace should come as soon as possible.

And so that neither the Russian government nor any other should place obstacles for Ukraine in establishing the desired peace and to lead our country to order, to a creative work, to strengthen the revolution and our feedom we, the Ukrainian Central Rada, inform all citizens of Ukraine of the following:

From this day on the Ukrainian National Republic becomes an independent, subordinated to none, free, sovereign State of the Ukrainian Nation.

With all neighboring states such as Russia, Poland, Austria, Romania, Turkey and others we want to live in peace and friendship but none of them can interfere with the life of an independent Ukrainian Republic. It is authority will belong only to the People of Ukraine and in its name, until the Ukrainian Constituent Assembly convenes, we the Ukrainian Central Rada, the representatives of working peasants, workers, and soldiers, shall govern together with our executive organ which as of today shall have the name of Council of National Ministers.

And this first of all we direct the government of our Republic, the Council of National Ministers to do, as of this day to conduct peace negotiations with the Central Powers, which already had begun, completely independently and to bring them to a conclusion, disregarding any obstacles from any other part of the former Russian Empire and to establish peace so that our country can begin life in peace and harmony.

The war has also claimed for itself all the working forces of our country. The majority of plants, factories and shops have been producing only what was necessary for war and the population was left entirely without goods. Now the war is over. Therefore we driect the Council of National Ministers to take immediate measures to adjust all plants and factories to peacetime conditions, for the production of goods needed, first of all by the toiling masses.

This very same war has given birth to hundreds of thousands of unemployed as well as invalids. In an Independent National Republic of Ukraine not one worker should suffer. The Government of the Republic is to upraise the industry of the State, has to initiate the construction work in all branches in which all unemployed would be able to find work and to utilize their force, and to make every effort to provide security for the maimed and those who have suffered from the war.

In the time of the old regime traders and various middle men had amassed great capital at the expense of the poor, suppressed classes. From the day on the Ukrainian National Republic is taking over the most important branches of trade and all profits will be returned for the benefit of the people. Our State will supervise the import and export of foods in order to prevent the high costs which are suffered by our poorest classes because of the speculators. For the execution of this directive we instruct the Government to prepare and submit for approval a law dealing with this as well as a law concerning the monopoly on iron, leather, tobacco, and other products and goods from which most profits were taken from the working classes for the benefit of non-working people.

Also we direct to establish state-national control over all banks which with credits and loans helped the non-working classes to exploit the working classes. From this day on help in the form of bank loans is to be given mainly for the support of labor and for the development of national economy of the Ukrainian National Republic rather than for speculation and various exploitation and gain on the part of the banks.

Founded on disorder, uneasy life and the lack of goods dissatisfaction is growing in some parts of the population. Various dark forces take advantage of this dissatisfaction and prod the ignorant people toward the old regime. These dark forces want once more to submit all free nations to a unified tsarist yoke of Russia. The Council of National Ministers should fight decisively against counter-revolutionary forces. And anyone who will urge an insurrection against the Independent Ukrainian National Republic, to return to the old regime, should be punished for state treason.

Regarding the so-called Bolsheviks and other aggressors who are destroying our country we direct the Government of the Ukrainian National Republic to take firm and decisive measures against them and we call upon all citizens of our Republic to defend the welfare and the freedom without regard for their life. Our National Ukrainian State should be cleared of the attackers sent from Petrograd who trample the rights of the Ukrainian Republic.

Immeasurably hard war, started by the bourgeois government, exhausted our Nation, already destroyed our country, ruined the economy. Now all of this must come to an end.

At the time when the army will be demobilized, we direct that some soldiers are to be released to their homes and after the peace treaties had been ratified, to dissolve the army completely; then, instead of a permanent army to create a national militia so that our troops would serve in the defense of the working people rather than the desires of the ruling strata.

Localities ruined by the war and demobilization are to be reconstructed with the help of our state treasury.

When our soldiers reach home, the people's councils—borough and country—and the city dumas are to be reelected at a prescribed future time so that also our soldiers would have a chance to vote. In order to establish a local authority which would enjoy the confidence and which would find support from all revolutionary democratic segments of the population, the Government should invite the cooperation (with the bodies of local self-government) of the councils of peasants, workers, and soldiers deputies, elected from among the local population.

In the matter of land, the commission elected at our last session, has already worked out a law concerning the transference of land to the working population without compensation, having accepted as the basis the abolishment of ownership and the socialization of land according to our resolution at the eighth session. This will be examined in a few days by the plenary Central Rada. The Council of National Ministers will use all means to see to it that the transfer of land into the hands of working people through the land committees will definitely take place before the spring works.

The forests, waters, and all underground wealth, as a property of the Ukrainian working population, is placed at the disposal of the Ukrainian National Republic.

All democratic freedoms proclaimed by the Third Universal, the Ukrainian National Republic reaffirms and especially proclaims: in the Independent Ukrainian National Republic all nationalities enjoy the right of national-personal autonomy, recognized by us through a law of January 20.

If we, the Ukrainian Central Rada, will not be able to accomplish in the following weeks the goals listed in this Universal, they will be completed by the Ukrainian Constituent Assembly.

We order our citizens to conduct the election to it very carefully: to take every measure to count the votes as quickly as possible, so that in a few weeks our Constituent Assembly—the supreme master and arranger of our Land—would strengthen liberty, order and welfare by a constitution of the Independent Ukrainian National Republic for the benefit of the entire working population, for the present and for the future.

This highest body is to decide the matter of federative union with the national republics of the former Russian state.

Up to that time we call upon all citizens of the Independent Ukrainian National Republic to stand firmly on guard of the gained freedom and the rights of our nation and to defend with every effort the liberty from all enemies of the Independent Ukrainian Republic of peasants and workers.

In Kiev, 22 January 1918.

UKRAINIAN CENTRAL RADA.

PRO COMPETITION CARGO ALLOCATION ACT OF 1989

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, on January 20, 1989, I introduced the Pro Competition Cargo Allocation Act of 1989 (H.R. 597) which is designed to reestablish equity and economic efficiency for all coastal ranges with respect to the transportation of the Federal Government's humanitarian relief commodities. This legislation would repeal the provisions of the 1985 farm bill which raised the cargo preference for U.S.-flag vessels from 50 to 75 percent within the Public Law 480 programs while creating a temporary "set-aside" of the limited portion of the title II program for the Great Lakes where U.S.-flag vessels are not available.

As I explained on the House floor on December 18, 1985, when these provisions were enacted:

The requirement that 75 percent of these cargoes be transported on U.S.-flag vessels, which choose not to serve the Great Lakes, has the potential to destroy Great Lakes ports and the port-related sectors of our Great Lakes economy.

* * * * *

Virtually the only cargoes our ports handle are the bagged, processed and fortified commodities of Title II, Public Law 480, and section 416. If the Department of Agriculture fails to properly interpret and apply the availability concept contained in the Cargo Preference Act, then, under this legislation, the Lakes will be eligible to bid on less than 5 percent of all grains shipped under Public Law 480, titles I, II, and III, and are more likely to successfully bid on a mere 3 percent.

I also want to put my colleagues and the USDA on notice that, should any port range be discriminated against in the administration of this subtitle, there will be that much added pressure to see the entire provision self-destruct at the earliest possible moment.—(December 18, 1985 Cong. Rec. at 37797.)

Mr. Speaker, as I feared in 1985 the USDA has continued to avoid implementing the availability concept of the Cargo Preference Act, enacting regulations which leave the Great Lakes to compete for only a minor percentage of the title II cargoes. And the economic pain which I previously predicted would be felt in the lakes is clearly evident. With a proper implementation of the availability concept the lakes would be able to compete on their economic merits, along with the other coastal ranges, for the balance of the cargo currently locked away from them by these regulations. It is important to note that my legislation would not prevent U.S.-flags who wanted to enter the lakes from asserting a preference for any of such cargo won by the lakes on their competitive merits. In short, with the availability concept properly enforced, returning to a 50-percent U.S.-flag preference with no "set-aside" for the Great Lakes is in the best interest of all the coastal ranges, the Federal agencies, the U.S.-flag industry, and the American taxpayers. I urge my colleagues to support the Pro Competition Cargo Allocation Act of 1989.

WHAT WERE THE EFFECTS OF CABLE DEREGULATION? ISN'T IT TIME WE KNEW?

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, as of January 1, 1987, cable television companies were free to charge any rate that they chose for their service. As with other aspects of the Cable Act of 1984, the effect of rate deregulation is not clear. Some cities have seen rates jump over 100 percent, yet the cable industry reports that, on average, rates have only risen about 6 percent. Comprehensive and reliable rate information is not available. To help us get the whole story of cable-rate deregulation, I am introducing H.R. 1375 the Cable Rate Disclosure Act of 1989.

As Congress assesses the success of the Cable Deregulation Act of 1984, some things are clear and others aren't. It is clear that cable televison is no longer the struggling new technology that it was in 1984. Cable television now serves almost half of all Americans. Cable stocks are up and the industry profits are booming.

However, it is not clear how our constituents have been impacted by rate deregulation. The National Cable Television Association, a cable trade association, has studied rates and found that on average they have only increased by 6 percent. But there are some who disagree. According to industry experts, rates have jumped much more. Below is a list of cities that have seen their rates jump 50 percent or more in the first year of deregulation.

The Cable Rate Disclosure Act of 1989 will help Congress get the whole story. It would require each cable company to report its rates to the FCC on a monthly basis the first report under the act would have to provide information dating back to January 1, 1987, the beginning of rate deregulation. Each month the FCC would be required to issue a statistical breakdown of the collected information.

However you feel about cable deregulation, you'll agree that the debate shouldn't be based on sketchy and biased information. Let's get the facts as best we can.

Below is a text of the bill:

H.R. 1375

A bill to require cable television operators to regularly disclose their rates and services to the Federal Communications Commission, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This Act may be cited as the "Cable Rate Disclosure Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) since January 1, 1987, the cable television industry has effectively become completely deregulated;

(2) the result of this deregulation is that local cable companies were freed to charge any price they desired;

(3) it is impossible to measure the effect this deregulation has had on prices for cable television services because there is no central and complete repository for information on such prices and services; and

(4) in order to oversee the effectiveness and fairness of the cable communications provisions of the Communications Act of 1934, it is necessary to require cable operators to provide regular information on their prices and services to the Federal Communications Commission.

SEC. 3. AMENDMENT.

Section 623 of the Communications Act of 1934 is amended—

(1) by redesignating subsection (h) as subsection (i); and

(2) by inserting after subsection (g) the following new subsection:

"(h)(1) Each cable operator shall submit to the Commission, not later than 120 days after the date of enactment of this subsection and by the 10th day of any month following a month in which the operator implements any change in the services it provides or the rates charged for such services, a report on such services and rates. Such report shall be in such form as the Commission may require by regulation and shall contain—

"(A) a description of any tiers of service provided and the rate charged for each tier and a statement of any other installation, disconnect, or other charges;

"(B) the total number of subscribers for each of such tiers;

"(C) any changes in rates charged for, or in services provided to, any such tier from the previous monthly report; and

"(D) such other information as the Commission may by regulation require.

"(2) The Commission shall compile the reports submitted under paragraph (1) and shall publish a statistical summary of such reports on a monthly basis. Such summary shall contain national, regional, and state average rates for representative tiers of service. The reports submitted under paragraph (1) shall be made available by the Commission for public inspection.

"(3) The first report submitted under paragraph (1) by each cable operator shall contain the information required by paragraph (1) with respect to each month between January 1, 1987, and the month preceding the month in which such report is submitted.".

LEGISLATION TO CORRECT AN INEQUITY THAT EXISTS IN PROVIDING FOR A FEDERAL SURVIVOR BENEFIT PLAN

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today that will allow Federal retirees who marry after they retire to provide survivor benefit plans for their spouses without incurring, in many cases, tremendous financial hardship.

Prior to 1986, Federal retirees who wished to provide a survivor benefit plan for their spouse could do so by taking a reduced annuity at the time they married. The annuity was reduced by a set formula effective the date of the marriage.

As a result of Public Law 98-615, any retiree who has married after February 26, 1986, is required to take a reduced annuity at the time of the marriage and pay a deposit that equals the difference between a full annuity and a reduced annuity—for survivor benefits—for every month since retirement that a retiree has not been married. In addition, the retiree must pay 6 percent interest on the deposit.

I am introducing legislation today that will restore the benefit following Federal retirees who marry after their annuity begins to take a reduction in their annuity at the time of marriage to provide for a survivor benefit. My bill would eliminate the current requirement to make retroactive deposits in order to elect survivor annuity benefits for a new spouse.

During the 100th Congress I introduced legislation which contained a provision similar to the bill I am introducing today. Since then, I have received letters from Federal retirees from around the country who have married later in life, sometimes years after their retirements have begun who, because of the deposit requirement, are simply unable financially to provide for a survivor benefit plan for their spouse. In order for some retirees to provide these necessary spousal benefits, deposits of up to $30,000 and higher must be paid.

Clearly, this requirement is unfair to both the retiree and to the spouse. A Federal retiree who decides to marry after his or her retirement begins should not be penalized for the years he or she was not married and did not foresee marriage in the future. Likewise, the new spouse should not be denied annuity protection because of the deposit requirement.

I am introducing this legislation because the inequity that exists for Federal retirees in providing for survivor benefits for a spouse should be corrected. The bill, which is supported by the National Association of Retired Federal Employees, restores fairness and equity for Federal retirees and their spouses and I hope Members will join me in sponsoring this legislation. A section analysis and a copy of the bill are included with this statement:

BILL ANALYSIS

Section 1. Under P.L. 98-615 Congress eliminated a benefit previously allowed for annuitants who marry after their annuity begins. Previous law allowed an annuitant to take a reduction in his or her annuity at the time of the marriage to provide for a survivor benefit. The law now requires that an annuitant make a contribution toward the survivor benefit for periods when he or she was not married and received a full annuity. This provision states that a deposit is not required of an annuitant to provide for a federal survivor benefit for a new spouse. Instead, the federal annuitant will receive a reduced annuity at the time of the marriage in order to provide for a survivor benefit.

Section 2. Directs GAO to study the survivor benefit program. The federal survivor benefit annuity seems to diminish in value more quickly than does the standard annuity. It is essential that the survivor annuity be made more resilient to the ravages of inflation.

GAO is directed to conduct a study and recommend cost effective ways to provide a stronger survivor annuity program. Such recommendations as the option to make larger annuity reductions for a more substantial survivor benefit, larger and additional benefits for older survivors who have been widowed for many years, and changes in the survivor annuity contribution formula should be explored by GAO.

H.R. 1377

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ELIMINATION OF DEPOSIT REQUIREMENT.

(a) CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT SYSTEM.—

(1) AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 8339(j).—Section 8339(j)(5)(C) of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(B) by striking clause (iii);

(C) by redesignating clauses (iv) and (v) as clauses (iii) and (iv), respectively; and

(D) by striking clause (vi).

(2) AMENDMENTS TO SECTION 8339(k).—

(A) Section 8339(k)(2)(B) of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(i) in clause (i), by striking "(B)(i)" and inserting "(B)", and by redesignating subclauses (I) and (II) as clauses (i) and (ii), respectively; and

(ii) by striking clause (ii).

(B) Section 8339(k)(2) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking subparagraphs (C) and (D).

(b) FEDERAL EMPLOYEES' RETIREMENT SYSTEM.—

(1) REPEAL.—Chapter 84 of title 5, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking section 8418; and

(B) in the chapter analysis, by striking the item relating to section 8418.

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 861(c) of the Foreign Service Act of 1980 (22 U.S.C. 4071j(c)) is amended by striking "8417, 8418," and inserting "8417".

SEC. 2. STUDY AND REPORT.

Within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Comptroller General shall study and submit a report to Congress on ways to maintain the long-term value of the survivor benefits provided under subchapter III of chapter 83 of title 5, United States Code, as well as those provided under chapter 84 of such title. The report shall include such recommendations as the Comptroller General considers appropriate.

COLUMBUS CITIZENS FOUNDATION HONORS JOSEPH A. GIMMA

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, March 15, the Columbus Citizens Foundation of New York will honor a very special octogenarian, Joseph Gimma. I want to share with my colleagues a recent article from the Catholic New York by Dennis Poust about this extraordinary gentleman.

Even at age 81, Joseph A. Gimma is hardly slowing down. Almost daily he still makes his way to his investment banking job in the financial district, just as he has for the past 65 years.

Gimma is one of the founders of the Columbus Citizens Foundation clubhouse. The 42-year-old organization, best known for sponsoring the Columbus Day Parade, is made up of prominent Italian-Americans. Currently there are about 400 members.

The main purpose of the group is to engage in philanthropic activities in support of Italian-American causes. It is dedicated to preserving and perpetuating the Italian-American culture.

On Wednesday evening, March 15, the foundation will honor Gimma at a testimonial dinner. Business leaders, politicians and sports personalities are expected to attend. At his side will be his wife of nearly 44 years, retired opera star Licia Albanese. Gimma likes to tell the story of how they met.

"My wife was already an opera star in Italy and she came here to sing at the Met," he recalled. "She came from the same town I did, Bari, and a friend asked me to watch over her. I did. I married her."

Opera isn't his wife's only talent, though. "She's an excellent cook besides being an excellent singer," he said. "She won my heart through my stomach."

Gimma is a self-made man. Emigrating from Italy at age 10 with his parents, he couldn't possibly have known that he would one day own a Park Avenue apartment and a home in Connecticut. Now a parishioner of St. Jean Baptiste in Manhattan, he lived on East 117th Street for two years before returning to the Bensonhurst section of Brooklyn, where he was raised.

On Feb. 8, 1924, he got his first job on Wall Street as an assistant bookkeeper at Herrick, Berg and Co. Over the past 65 years he has seen the many ups and downs of the financial market first hand. He is now a senior vice president/financial consultant at Shearson Lehman Hutton.

Gimma was there for the stock market crash of 1929. By then he was an audit clerk. "I stayed in that cubbyhole office for 72 hours without seeing daylight, before going home," he recalled. "The volume was incredible."

Always interested in horse racing, Gimma was appointed to the New York State Racing Commission by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller in 1960. He has been reappointed ever since and has officiated during the huge growth in the sport over the past 25 years. He also serves as a commissioner of the state's Thoroughbred Breeding and Development Fund Corp., a program which promotes breeding and horse racing in general.

In the 1960's, Gimma was chairman of the New York Republican County Committee. A twist of fate saved his life when he was running for the office. He was scheduled to fly to the West Coast on racing business but was informed by Attorney General Louis Lefkowitz that he had not given sufficient notice to the county committee and he had to wait an additional 24 hours. The flight he was scheduled to be on crashed on take-off from LaGuardia Airport.

Being commissioner was a difficult job. "My wife was in the prime of her singing career," he said. "The phone would ring until two or three in the morning, even with an unlisted number. If a commissioner died, before the body even got cold they'd call to recommend replacements. That's the only time my wife ever gave me an ultimatum—quit my job or she'd divorce me. I quit."

THE NORTHEAST - MIDWEST CONGRESSIONAL COALITION TAKES AIM

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, the 101st Congress faces an array of critical challenges that profoundly impact the economy and quality of life throughout Northeastern and Midwestern States. The Northeast-Midwest Coalition has outlined its regional policy agenda for the 101st Congress in our biweekly newsletter, the Northeast-Midwest Economic Review. I would like to share the following excerpt from the Economic Review with my colleagues and I encourage coalition members to become involved in advancing this regional agenda.

[Taken from the Northeast-Midwest Economic Review]

THE BUDGET AND THE REGION

The enormous federal deficit will be the top priority for the new administration and Congress. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that this year's federal budget will add another $155 billion to the debt. But this figure includes a $97 billion surplus in the trust funds (for Social Security, highways, airports, unemployment compensation, and the other programs with dedicated sources of revenue), masking a real deficit in the general funds of $252 million.

The total federal debt of $2.8 trillion is so huge that it's easy to lose perspective. Consider, however, that the national debt translates into a $37,000 bill for every American family, and that every man, woman and child in the United States must pay $4 in taxes each day just to cover the interest on this debt.

The Northeast-Midwest Institute and Coalitions have long focused on the budget, arguing that the region doesn't receive its fair share of the federal payments. In fact, the distortion against northern states is pervasive and long-standing. Historically, the South and West have been the major beneficiaries of military installations, natural resource developments, and infrastructure projects. In fiscal 1987 the South and West received $1.12 for every dollar they paid in federal taxes, while the northeastern and midwestern received only 86 cents for every dollar sent to the Treasury.

The distortion may become worse as Congress faces an explosion of unfunded costs, most of which will go out of the region. Bailing out troubled savings & loans in Texas, for instance, could cost $100 billion. Cleaning up the nation's aging and environmentally hazardous nuclear weapons production plants in the South and Northwest could cost another $200 billion.

The region may take another fiscal jolt because of the 1990 Census. Recent estimates suggest midwestern and northeastern states will lose 14 seats in the House of Representatives. The region, as a result, will have less power when the Electoral College selects the president and when the House votes on legislation. But more startling and troubling is the projected loss of money. Because billions of federal dollars are allocated by formulas based in part on population, the Northeast-Midwest region can expect major reductions—several hundred million dollars—in its share of federal funding. The impacted programs include some of the most basic support initiatives for our communities—highway funds, Community Development Block Grants, LIHEAP, Head Start, Vocational Education, Drug and Alcohol Abuse, airport improvements, and payments to agricultural stations. The Institute's challenge, therefore, is to identify formula changes that could cushion the pending loss of money.

During this period of fiscal difficulty, the Northeast-Midwest groups plan to expand their budget work substantially. As usual, the organizations will release an immediate response to, as well as a thorough analysis of the Administration's proposed budget. In addition, the groups will publish an 18-state review of the flow of federal funds, and a detailed analysis of the federal grants to states. Our goal, quite simply, is to be the region's source for federal budget data.

MILITARY EXPENDITURES

Although the Northeast-Midwest region has 43 percent of the nation's population, it receives only 32.6 percent of defense spending. Despite containing almost twice the population of California, for instance, the seven midwestern states receive just over half the amount of federal prime contracts in 1987 than the state of California alone. The distribution of military personnel also is heavily against the Northeast and Midwest; fewer than 20 percent of all Department of Defense personnel, and only 14.2 percent of active-duty personnel, were located in the region in 1986.

Because of the disproportionately small share of military spending the region receives, the Northwest-Midwest Congressional Coalition has led efforts to help firms compete effectively for federal procurement contracts. The procurement Technical Assistance Cooperative Agreement Program provides matching funds to state and local governments and nonprofit organizations that give technical assistance to businesses seeking federal contracts.

The Coalitions also played an active role in the military base-closing legislation, successfully promoting report language that called for regional equity in any base-closing plan. Efforts must continue however, because the Commission has recommended that 54 percent of the net personnel losses (11,060 jobs) occur in northeastern and midwestern states. The South, in contrast, is scheduled to gain 1,150 jobs, while the West loses 10,697 military and civilian slots.

OIL IMPORT FEE

An oil import fee would harm most states, particularly those in the Northeast-Midwest region. Working with state officials, the Institute and Coalition prepared several reports showing that an import fee would shift $8 billion out of the economies of the eight largest oil consuming states, which are New York, Florida, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Georgia, and California.

Although President Bush opposes an import fee, several members of Congress are eyeing the measure to raise revenue. The Coalitions will continue to block the fee's adoption.

JEANE KIRKPATRICK DISCUSSES HUMAN RIGHTS: UNITED NATIONS HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION CRITICIZES ROMANIAN POLICIES AND CUBAN VIOLATIONS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, our former Ambassador to the United Nations, Dr. Jeane Kirkpatrick, wrote an excellent column last week focusing on the latest indications of hope in the area of human rights. Based on her experience representing the United States at the United Nations, she discussed important developments at the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva.

Since her column appeared, there were other extremely interesting developments in Geneva. Not only did Hungary join in sponsoring the proposal calling for an investigation of human rights conditions in Romania, but when the issue came up for a final vote, representatives of the Soviet Union, East Germany, and Bulgaria did not appear to cast their votes. Romania's egregious human rights violations have isolated it—not only from the democratic countries—but also from its own Warsaw Pact allies.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that Dr. Kirkpatrick's article be placed in the RECORD for the benefit of our colleagues in the House.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 6, 1989]

AT LAST, A LITTLE ATTENTION TO HUMAN RIGHTS

(By Jeane Kirkpatrick)

Three events last week illustrated the growing importance of human rights issues in global power politics.

Two occurred at the U.N.'s Human Rights Commission in Geneva, where it was demonstrated that these issues are no longer merely a function of bloc politics. That's good news.

Meanwhile, the man who didn't come to dinner in Beijing showed how difficult it has become for an American president to conduct big-power diplomacy with undemocratic governments without his talks being snagged on questions of how that government treats its own citizens.

The biggest surprise came in Geneva when the Hungarian delegate joined in calling for an investigation of its Warsaw Pact ally, Romania.

"We are concerned that human rights and fundamental freedoms are . . . gravely violated in Romania," Hungarian Deputy Foreign Minister Gyula Horn told the commission. Horn cited the destruction of villages, the denial of religious freedom and the forced assimilation of minorities. These policies, Horn asserted, have caused some 15,000 Romanians to seek asylum in Hungary.

It was the first time that one Communist country had joined in a human-rights action against another. This never happens. Adding to the surprise, Horn said he had not consulted the Soviet Union on the issue.

Hungary's defection is an unprecedented move toward independent diplomacy by an Eastern bloc country. It also raises new hopes that U.N. human rights cases can be decided on their merits rather than reflexively by bloc voting.

Communist states have a distinctive approach to human rights. They do not believe that individuals have rights against their governments. Therefore, Communist rulers can use their power without inhibition. They also can use it without fear of international embarassment. Because Communist states vote together and can normally count on the support of the Non-Aligned Movement, they can avoid becoming the object of a human rights investigation or censure. Sophisticated European governments—understanding how the mutual protection system works—have not pressed the issue.

The system that has provided immunity to Communist states was only shaken in the early years of the Reagan administration, when U.S. Human Rights Commissioner Michael Novak and Richard Schifter, deputy commissioner, finally succeeded (by a single vote) in getting Poland's repression of Solidarity on the Human Rights Commission agenda.

It proved easier to get Afghanistan's victimization by the Soviet Union on the agenda because Islamic Conference delegates helped. Moreover, the Afghan reports by Felix Ermacora set a new standard for fairness in the work of the U.N. commission and demonstrated that Communist countries could no longer count on being exempt from scrutiny.

This meant that Cuba was no longer immune. The testimony of hundreds of former Cuban political prisoners was already on the public record. And in 1987 Allan Keyes, assistant secretary for international organizations, and U.N. Ambassador Vernon Walters, the U.S. permanent representative, forced discussion of the issue.

In 1988 new U.S. human rights commissioner and former Cuban political prisoner Armando Valladares pushed the issue onto the agenda, despite Fidel Castro's intense personal involvement and appeal to Latinidad. On the principle of "If you can't beat them, join them," Cuba agreed to a U.N. investigation of its human rights practices. And, in a "friendly" process, Cuban government officials tried hard to justify 30 years of repression as the consequence of a 30-year emergency.

Last week in Geneva, in the second event, the Senegalese chair issued a report on Cuba on behalf of himself and the five members of his U.N. investigating group. Although bland and bureaucratic in style and substance, the report presented facts that, as Valladares says, "show in an impartial manner what the Cuban revolution has denied for 30 years: The fact that there are violations of human rights in all categories and dimensions."

He said it demonstrates "that the constitutional legal system is structured contrary to the letter and spirit of internationally accepted human rights standards."

Although Castro's representatives have tried hard to explain away the investigation and report, the cataloque of 1,600 Cuban complaints, ranging from beatings to imprisonment for possessing a Bible to denial of a job for political reasons, remains on the record.

Fidel Castro has not enjoyed being in the international spotlight for his Draconian laws and more Draconian practices. His representatives are trying hard to end the scrutiny.

In the third event last week, officials of the People's Republic of China made it clear that they share Castro's view that the relationship between the government and its citizens is strictly "their" business. It was not enough that the American president had remained silent concerning repression in Tibet and other Chinese human-rights abuses, Beijing's government (a spokesman explained) was "disappointed" that "old friend" George Bush had involved himself in their internal affairs by inviting a leading dissident to dinner.

Who knows? Maybe Hungary will support a U.N. investigation into this matter.

DAMN THE FACTS; FULL SPEED AHEAD

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, recent testimony of the Navy before House committees helps explain why it is so hard for peace to break out and why military spending demands are so insatiable.

On February 18, 1988, Adm. Ronald J. Hays, Commander in Chief of the U.S. Pacific Command testified before the House Armed Services Committee:

We have worked hard to maintain an adequate number of steaming days, flying hours, and vehicle miles so that equipment are exercised and the people are trained.

Regarding budget cuts, he said:

Commanders have made the logical, if difficult, decisions from the slim range of options available, but there should be no question about there being an eventual impact upon readiness. With fewer exercises * * * force readiness will deteriorate.

This year, Rear Adm. Thomas Brooks, Director of Naval Intelligence, testified before the House Armed Services Committee that the Soviet Navy has had a decline in its steaming hours and an increase in its time at anchor, and, he said:

* * * increased the number of ships in port ready to respond to an enemy attack, thus improving the ability of the Soviet Navy to transition rapidly to war.

Mr. Speaker, when the enemy spends less money on its Navy, it is good and a sign of their warlike preparations. When we do it, it is dangerous and bad. No matter what the enemy does, we should spend more.

One does not know whether to laugh or cry at these positions. I come down on the side of it being very, very sad.

TRIBUTE TO REV. CHARLES NOBLE

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, today, I wish to pay special tribute to the Reverend Charles Noble, and his wife Nora, who together have helped many children through their unique school, The Par-Excellence Center in Newark, OH. Rev. Noble, pastor of the Shiloh Baptist Missionary Church, founded the center back in 1988 with the goal of helping gifted, disadvantaged children in kindergarten through the fifth grade to break out of the cycle of bad environment and low self-esteem rooted in the failed welfare system. I commend to my colleagues the following article from the "Granville Booster," concerning Rev. Noble's efforts on behalf of these needy students.

[From the Granville Booster, Jan. 16, 1989]

LEARNING CENTER BREAKS SYSTEM'S ENTRAPMENT

(By Liesha Hurwitz)

The Shiloh Baptist Missionary Church stands in a quiet dead-end street in Newark's east side. Go downstairs on a weekday and you will be greeted by the sounds of children's voices. This is the location for the Par-Excellence Learning Center, a new alternative school for children in kindergarten through 5th grade. The Par-Excellence Center was started in August 1988 and is the brainchild of the Reverend Charles Noble, pastor of the church, and his wife Nora, who is the administrator of the school. When the Center opened, they did not know where the money to fund it would come from, but Rotary made a commitment that very day and enabled them to start up.

Reverend Noble came to the area in 1969 and finding conditions in the neighborhood deplorable, slowly started working on improving things, especially in the 15 acres around the church. He was determined to make the east end a productive area instead of a drain on the Newark community. Drawing on help from the citizens and public interest groups in the area, Reverend Noble has spearheaded many projects, including the enlargement of the church, the construction of subsidized apartments and the current building of a center for the mentally handicapped in the area.

The Par-Excellence Center was started because Reverend and Mrs. Noble saw the pressing need of "gifted disadvantaged children" trapped in the cycle of a "bad environment and low self-esteem". They accepted the challenge to help these children and their families escape the cycle through the school program. The Center is geared to provide a total learning environment—starting the children at as early an age as possible, to help give them a good education and a sense of self-worth so that they can become productive members of society. The school encourages the parents to participate in their children's education. Mrs. Noble has found that the children's rapid progress challenged their parents to keep up with them. Parents are encouraged to continue their own education and also to find work if they are on welfare.

Reverend Noble considers the welfare system to be "out of hand" and at the root of the problem. He has seen generations of families caught in the welfare system and hopes to have minimized the community's reliance on welfare in 10 to 15 years time. "The co..munity is like a family, with desirable and undesirable elements. Dope, crime and delinquency emanate from the undesirable and the underprivileged . . . and one cannot simply get rid of them." He says that there are three ways to deal with the problem—" educate, incarcerate or support—and its least expensive to educate." With the Par-Excellence Center, he maintains, each child they train will be one less liability to a community.

Speaking to Mrs. Noble, you can hear her dedication to the Center, as she talks enthusiastically about students who have made tremendous progress in her program. She tells of one child who came from a public school and would cry when asked to perform any task. He is now getting an A-grade in math and when asked to do something now replies that he "can do anything". Mrs. Noble attributes the success of children like these who have not performed well in the public school system to the one-on-one relationship of "loving and caring" that the Center encourages. She says that three months in her school will see great improvements in the self-esteem and performance of these children.

Mrs. Noble ensures that she knows everything about each student and she and her staff (four full-time teachers, 2 part-time and a school secretary) will go to whatever lengths to bring out the potential in each child, whether it means engaging the parents in discussions about the amounts of T.V. a child watches at home, or staying after school hours to help a child with reading or homework. She has found that motivating parents plays a large part in the child's progresss. She counsels parents and speaks to them whenever the need arises, encouraging them to "keep up with their children". Parents take an active part in the Center, involving themselves in fundraising and public relations work.

There are currently 42 students enrolled in the program and Mrs. Noble predicts that by 1990 there will be approximately 110, judging from the public response she has received. She plans to include children younger than kindergarten age in the future and to introduce new programs such as computer classes. The Center is geared towards underprivileged children but is open to any child from Licking County who wishes to attend. School fees are based on the ability to pay, some parents paying full tuition if they are able.

The Center is guided by three groups of outside professionals and educators—the Par-Excellence Advisory Group, the Par-Excellence Partners and the Par-Excellence Trustees. Each helps to provide resources in terms of the direction of the Center, in generating resources and in setting policies. The Center is in constant need of funds (there are not enough finances to staff a kitchen yet) and of volunteers to help children with homework from 3-5 p.m. on weekdays, to act as reading tutors during the school term as well as during the summer educational program and also as fundraisers.

The school day starts with 15 minutes of Chapel services, but Reverend Noble maintains that they do not preach doctrine to the children in the classroom, feeling that a well-rounded education best enables a child to integrate successfully into society. In his words, the Center is built on "the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Mankind" and that "learning, loving and living" is their motto.

DOUBLE STANDARD ON HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, President Bush deserves credit for inviting Fang Lizhi to the banquet he had in the People's Republic of China. I wish the President had been more forthright in expressing his unhappiness when Mr. Fang was denied entry to that banquet by the Chinese authorities. We have an obligation to make it clear to the People's Republic of China, as well as the Soviet Union and every other regime, that friendly nation to nation relations with the United States do not mean that we will give up our commitment to human rights. In fact, I must say that I am disappointed that neither President Reagan nor President Bush has been as forthright in reminding the Chinese of our commitment to human rights as consistency, and a commitment to moral principles would require.

The Chinese mistreatment of people in Tibet is a grave example of human rights abuses, but it is one which has gone relatively unrebuked by the Reagan and Bush administrations.

There is a danger not only that we will decline to assert our support for human rights within the People's Republic of China because of some geopolitical motive, there have also been arguments made that the sort of human rights which we are committed to in much of the world has less application in non-Western society. That is a dangerous, illogical, and ultimately racist argument that ought to get no credit whatever in our country.

I do not mean in any way to suggest that this is one of the arguments that has been put forward by the Reagan and Bush administrations for their failure to push human rights; rather this is an argument that comes from other quarters. Because we have heard variants of this argument, I was particularly pleased to read recently in "The Washington Post" an article by Fang Lizhi, translated by Orville Schell, in which he affirms the universality of human rights principles, and makes clear in my judgment our obligation as a society to press for the vindication of human rights everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the article by Fang Lizhi printed in "The Washington Post" for Sunday, February 26, be printed here.

[From the Washington Post]

DOUBLE STANDARD ON HUMAN RIGHTS?

(By Fang Lizhi)

(Among the guests invited to the banquet that President Bush hosts today in Beijing will be Chinese astrophysicist and human-rights activist Fang Lizhi. Fang, previously vice president of China's University of Science and Technology, was expelled from the Chinese Communist party in 1987 and has since been barred from leaving the country. He has continued to speak openly for democracy and human rights and last month launched an appeal to Deng Xiaopang to declare an amnesty of all political prisoners in China. Fang wrote this article for The Washington Post shortly before receiving the president's surprise invitation, which is expected to bolster the cause of human-rights activists in China.)

BEIJING.—For their narrow purposes, some politicians have adopted a double standard in regard to human rights. In specific, they have adopted a double standard by holding different attitudes toward human rights events in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe on the one hand and China on the other. When dealing with the former, they have openly expressed concern and have even made the issue a paramount condition in matters of their foreign policy. But, when dealing with the latter, they have said and done very little. This has not only shown a wrong attitude, but has hardly been in the spirit of human rights themselves.

China is presently in the process of implementing social reforms of both an economic and political nature. One of the most important aspects of these reforms should be the improvement of the Chinese human-rights situation.

After embracing the dogma of class struggle, just like the Soviet Union and the various socialist countries of Eastern Europe, China has found itself host to a whole series of occasions where human rights in China were violated on a very wide scale. In 1957 during the political persecutions of the Anti-Rightist movement alone, some 500,000 people were purged because of their thoughts and opinions. Some lost their jobs, while others were shipped off for "reform through labor."

To this day the fates of many of these are still unknown. And, as for our record of disrespect for religious rights and the rights of minority peoples, China has been no different than any other socialist country.

Compared to the era of Mao Zedong, the situation of this past decade has indeed showed some improvement. However, the way in which present Chinese authorities continue either to disregard or to simply ignore the question of human rights makes for a grave situation.

First and foremost, Chinese authorities have still not completely acknowledged that the human-rights violations alluded to above were wrong in principle.

For example, to this day they still proclaim the Anti-Rightist movement of 1957 as necessary and "correct." Since then, the suppression and persecution of people with differing beliefs and opinions has never ceased. Obvious examples of this policy are the suppression of the Democracy Wall movement in 1970, the campaign against "spiritual pollution" in 1983 and the movement against "bourgeois" in 1987. And lest the world forget, Democracy Wall activists Wei Jingsheng and other similar political prisoners have now been in jail for 10 years, and up until now still remain unreleased.

Throughout this truly grim period, efforts by some on behalf of human rights never ceased, gaining the support of rights activists and organizations elsewhere in the world. As a consequence, China human-rights activists have now become part of the large global trend towards respecting such rights.

There should, in fact, be a universal standard for human rights everywhere. Just as the International Declaration of Human Rights has declared, the rights and freedoms that all men ought to enjoy should not be denied because of race, color, sex, language, religion, politics or any other reason.

In struggling for human rights we must not only oppose those incidents where human rights have been totally disregarded, but also oppose the notion that there is a double standard for different countries.

In short, we must struggle towards a notion of human rights as having universal application.

BALANCED BUDGET SPENDING AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

HON. JON L. KYL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a balanced budget/spending limitation amendment to the Constitution.

Last November, the American people elected George Bush to the Presidency, giving him a resounding mandate to reduce the Federal budget deficit without raising taxes. The amendment I am introducing today will not only ensure that Congress and the President balance the budget, but that we do so consistent with that mandate—by restraining spending.

This amendment's balanced budget requirement will become effective in fiscal year 1993, once the deficit has presumably been reduced to zero under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. What makes this amendment unique, however, is that it also limits Federal expenditures to no more than 19 percent of gross national product.

Although that is about the level of spending we would have today if we balanced the budget without raising taxes, it isn't the only reason the 10-percent figure was chosen. For the past 15 years, Federal revenues have remained relatively constant around 19 percent of GNP. They ranged from a low of 18 percent in fiscal year 1973 to a high of 20.1 percent at the start of the Reagan administration in fiscal year 1981. This year, they are estimated to be 19.3 percent of GNP.

Spending, on the other hand, has increased as a proportion of GNP. In fiscal year 1983, Federal spending was only 19.2 percent of GNP. It went as high as 24.3 percent in fiscal year 1983, before beginning to decline to the estimated 21 percent of GNP for this year.

President Bush's budget estimates that Federal revenues will increase by about $82 billion in fiscal year 1990 as a result of economic growth. Even with that increase, total Federal revenues in fiscal year 1990 will amount to the 19.3 percent of GNP which I just mentioned.

If Congress applied about half of that revenue increase to deficit reduction, we could meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit target of $100 billion, and we could apply the other half to existing programs. By just limiting the growth in Federal spending, the deficit will begin to close—without a tax increase. The balanced budget/spending limitation amendment can take effect in fiscal year 1993 without any major disruption to the economy.

About 15 States have constitutional limits on how much their State or local governments can spend, and they work well. My home State of Arizona has had a State spending limit for about 10 years, and is the second fastest growing State in the Nation. A spending limit can work equally as well at the Federal level.

I invite my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this amendment and demonstrating to the American people that we are serious about deficit reduction. I also urge the Judiciary Committee to begin holding hearings at an early date.

H.J. RES. 189

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years after the date of its submission for ratification:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Except as provided in this article, expenditures of the United States Government for any fiscal year shall not exceed its revenues for that fiscal year.

"SEC. 2. Except as provided in this article, the expenditures of the United States Government for a fiscal year may not exceed 19 per centum of the Nation's gross national product for the last calendar year ending before the beginning of such fiscal year.

"SEC. 3. The Congress may, by law, and subject to article I, section 7 of the Constitution, provide for suspension of the effect of sections 1 and 2 of this article for any fiscal year in which a declaration of war is in effect or whenever three-fifths of the total membership of each House shall provide, by a rollcall vote, for a specific excess of outlays over estimated revenues.

"SEC. 4. The Congress shall implement and enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"SEC. 5. This article shall apply to the first fiscal year beginning after its ratification and subsequent fiscal years, but not to fiscal years beginning before October 1, 1992.".

QUADRENNIAL COMMISSION

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would implement the pay increases recommended for judicial and executive branch employees by the President's Quadrennial Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries. Salaries for Members of Congress would not be affected by the bill.

When we in Congress voted to reject the Commission's recommendations for ourselves last month, it almost seemed like a minor footnote that we also denied long overdue and well deserved raises for 2,000 federally employed scientists, economists, policy advisers, foreign service professionals, and judges. In a real sense, as a number of our colleagues have already pointed out, salaries for these men and women, which are by law linked to our own, are being unfairly held hostage to our unwillingness to raise our own salaries.

I would note that top executive branch employees were also denied cost of living adjustments in 5 of the last 8 years when we in Congress decided to exempt ourselves from COLA's. The Quadrennial Commission concluded this year that current salary levels for top executive and judicial branch employees have eroded over the last 20 years by approximately 35 percent in constant dollars, while salaries for other Americans have increased above the rate of inflation.

The huge differential between what these talented and highly skilled professionals earn and what their counterparts in the private sector, and even the nonprofit sector, are earning is appalling. Distinguished Federal judges earn less than many of the young corporate lawyers just a few years out of law school who appear before them in court. Department chairmen at the National Institutes of Health [NIH] are paid less than half what they could be paid at a university hospital. As a result, NIH has suffered a loss of 28 percent of its most senior research scientists in the last 10 years; all left to accept positions in private industry at salary increases of 50 percent to 300 percent. NASA officials are fearing, quite justifiably, the probable loss of many of its most experienced and highly trained technicians to private industry.

It is true that public service has traditionally demanded some financial sacrifice in exchange for less tangible rewards. But these men and women hold some of the most important and demanding jobs in the world, and their decisions often have permanent and dramatic effects on all of our lives. These positions should, without question, be held by the most competent people we can find. Their compensation should match the level of responsibility and authority they hold.

Mr. Speaker, the system we devised to address the very sticky issue of appropriate pay for Members of Congress has failed—clearly we will need to find a better way to decide on the level of congressional salaries in the future. But the biggest losers in this debacle are without a doubt the senior executive and judicial branch employees who were also affected by our vote to reject the Quadrennial Commission's recommendations. The truth is that unless we act soon to remedy this problem, the Federal Government stands to lose some of its most talented professionals, and our ability to attract highly qualified replacements will be severely weakened. I urge my colleagues to support this very important legislation.

THE BRYANT BILL

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, on March 8, the Journal of Commerce carried a splendid editorial which concluded that the Bryant amendment to restrict foreign investment in the United States, would be "destructive" to U.S. interests.

The Bryant bill is being promoted as an innocent exercise in data collection. Not so. Demanding that foreign investors file statements not required of U.S. companies is blatantly discriminatory, and a violation of the very goals we are trying to achieve right now in international trade negotiations.

Then, making the information public, or giving it to the Congress which is the same thing, would immediately slow the flow of foreign capital to the United States. Interest rates would climb and small borrowers would be frozen out.

The right way to slow foreign capital, lower interest rates, and reduce the trade balance, is reduce Federal spending. The promoters of the Bryant amendment apparently find such rational economic policies unattractive, but oddly enough, the public seems to understand them.

This is not the only editorial to strip the sheep's clothing from the Bryant amendment, but it is an easily understandable one.

The Journal of Commerce article follows:

[From the Journal of Commerce, Mar. 8, 1989]

THE BRYANT BILL

Foreign takeovers are preoccupying Congress again. Within the next few days, the House of Representatives faces a vote allowing members to express their outrage about the "wave" of foreign investment swamping the American economy. The legislation before them will not only discourage foreign investment, but will give American companies one more way to use the U.S. government to attack foreign competitors.

The bill, by Rep. John Bryant, D-Texas, is being promoted as an innocent way to improve data collection about the scope of foreign investment in the United States. Foreigners who buy more than 5% of a U.S. company or U.S. real estate would have to register with the government, disclosing their identity, address, nationality and the industry in which they have invested. Where the foreigners take over more than 25% of a U.S. business, they would also have to reveal the names and nationalities of their directors and officers, the market value of their purchases and detailed information about their assets and their finances.

On the surface, this appears to be a simple exercise in data gathering, providing the federal government with the information it needs to gauge the impact of foreign investment in the United States. But the need for that data is not at all evident. The U.S. government already collects extensive information on foreign investment. Advocates of additional reporting have failed to show why that data base is inadequate for the requirements of federal policy-makers.

Demanding that foreign investors file financial statements in Washington, when privately held U.S. investors face no such requirement, is blatant discrimination. Even worse is the bill's provision that information filed by individual foreign investors will be public information. In a sharp departure from the government's practice of shielding the identity of individual firms when it gathers data for statistical purposes, information about the transactions of individual "foreign" firms would be exposed to the world.

Under U.S. securities law, publicly held U.S. companies must disclose only information that has a material impact on their earnings. In the vast majority of cases, the details of investments by public companies remain confidential, and almost all similar information concerning private firms is shielded from public view.

Under the Bryant bill, "foreign-owned" companies, including companies with as little as 25% foreign ownership, would no longer enjoy that same degree of confidentiality. If American-owned Amoco Oil Co. were to buy a small plant that makes an advanced plastic, it could keep the size of its venture secret. If foreign-owned Royal Dutch/Shell were to build a similar facility, its competitors could well learn exactly how much money it is putting into the project—an extremely important piece of competitive intelligence that would make it easier to divine Shell's future plans.

The consequence of such a regulation is obvious. Foreign investors will need to think twice before putting their money into the United States and exposing their corporate secrets to the world.

For Rep. Bryant, a strike against foreign investment may offer just the lift needed to run for the Senate in 1990. For the United States, however, few actions could be more destructive.

The growth of foreign direct investment in the United States has less to do with the evil designs of foreigners than with America's inability to set its economic house in order. Since the beginning of the 1980s, the U.S. government has consistently run budget deficits of unprecedented magnitude. At the same time, the savings rate has hit record lows. With Americans' private savings inadequate to finance the government's needs and private-sector investment demand as well, foreign money has been required to make up the difference.

To the extent that that foreign money represents an increase in the productive base of the United States, Americans will be better off in future years. But a large share of those foreign funds have financed consumption, not investment. The bill for that consumption takes the form of an outflow of profits. Foreign investors in American farms, mines, and factories gain a claim on the wealth those resources will produce in future years.

Rep. Bryant's bill would discourage foreigners from putting their money in the United States without altering the basic economic factors that have made America dependent upon foreign investment. That may play well to the voters back home, but at great cost to the United States. Rather than railing about the dangers of foreign ownership of the U.S. economy, Rep. Bryant and his colleagues would do well to deal with the high budget deficit and the low savings rate that are among its principal causes.

STATEMENT FROM THE ESTONIAN AMERICAN NATIONAL COUNCIL

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise to express my strong support for the people of Soviet-occupied Estonia in connection with the 71st anniversary of Estonia's Declaration of Independence on February 24. I call upon my colleagues to stand with me in recognizing the right for all Estonians to political, religious, and economic freedom. At this time I would like to insert into the RECORD a recent statement from the Estonian American National Council and urge my colleagues to join me in this most noble and worthy cause on behalf of liberty.

ESTONIA: POLITICAL AWARENESS AND NATIONAL REAWAKENING, 1988-89

1988 was a dramatic year of demonstrations, rallies, song fests and unprecedented political activity in Soviet-occupied Estonia, all of it aimed, ultimately, at the eventual restoration of Estonian independence. The world media have been filled with images of "the mouse that roared," as a country of one million seemed to challenge an empire of 300 million.

In a true grassroots movement, Estonian demands for reform, democracy and outright independence came directly from the long-suppressed Estonian people—fully one-third of the population attended a rally September 17, while 900,000 signed a petition opposing proposed Soviet Constitutional changes as undemocratic and harmful to Estonian interests. National and local-level groups and organizations, representative of a variety of approaches but united in their final objective, continue to form.

Estonians were brought to this level of activity by a growing awareness that their very survival as a people is threatened by the continued Soviet occupation and colonization of their homeland. Kept keenly aware—by the presence of 150,000 Soviet troops—that they live in an nation under occupation, Estonians yearn once again to be masters in their own home, to control their own economy and natural resources, to decide their own internal affairs, their own destiny. At its founding ceremonies August 20, 1988, the Estonian National Independence Party declared: "We do not have enough clean air, water or earth to sustain life, let alone freedom . . . Add to that the danger of becoming a minority in our own ancient land."

As a possible indicator of things to come, the Soviet press has been villifying Estonia for months, to the point that the Estonian Popular Front has sued TASS for slander. However, while well aware of the ever-present potential for a Soviet crack-down or of a violent backlash led by the Russian chauvinist organization "International Front," Estonians still push peacefully for further reforms and democratization. Counting on continued moral and real support from the free world, Estonians are proceeding with careful, measured steps to move away from Moscow's control and toward true sovereignty.

The goals of free Estonians and of the international Estonian resistance movement remain:

1. That the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact along with its secret protocols be declared null and void from the moment of its inception.

2. That Estonian-Soviet relations be governed by the 1920 Peace Treaty of Tartu, in which the USSR promised to respect Estonian sovereignty "forever".

3. That all Soviet troops, militia and paramilitary forces be withdrawn from Estonian soil.

4. That the existing Soviet colonial administration and bureaucracy in Estonia be dismantled.

5. That reparations be paid to the Estonian people and to all individuals and families who have suffered directly or indirectly as a result of Soviet-German collusion, invasions and occupations of Estonia since 1939.

6. That democratic elections be conducted, initially under international supervision.

7. That, as a former member of the League of Nations, Estonia be admitted to United Nations membership and reinstated into all other international organizations, conferences and institutions to which Estonia belonged.

In Moscow on November 17, 1988, the Estonian National Independence Party presented to members of the U.S. CSCE (Helsinki) Commission a "Memorandum Concerning the Situation in Estonia". This document concludes:

The time is ripe to begin to discuss the restoration of Estonian independence in much more concrete terms. It is our desire, that the developments in the Baltic states be taken into the orbit of the key issues concerning the United States Congress and Government and that there be a deeper and sincere understanding and appreciation of the efforts of Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians as they strive to restore their national independence.

A practical step would be the placement of impartial UN observers into the Baltic states to ensure a peaceful transition to democracy.

An international conference should be organized within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to discuss the problems and aspirations of the Baltic states (with representatives of Estonian, Latvian and Lithuanian independence movements invited to attend).

We propose that discussions be initiated concerning a problem of key importance, namely the removal of Soviet occupation forces from Baltic territory. These discussions should be an integral part of all arms reduction talks in Europe and a logical extension of talks in connection with the evacuation of Soviet forces from Afghanistan. A milti-lateral international agreement on the evacuation of Soviet forces from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania must be based on the condition that independence be restored to those states. The resulting neutral Baltic states, independent of any power-bloc, could play a valuable and positive role in the collective security of Europe.

REPORT FROM THE INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE ON EXAMINATION AND COMPLIANCE ACTIVITIES IN THE AREA OF TAX-EXEMPT ORGANIZATIONS INVOLVED IN TELEVISION MINISTRIES

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Ways and Means, Subcommittee on Oversight, which I chair, held a hearing in October 1987 to examine the Federal tax rules applicable to tax-exempt organizations involved in television ministries. In followup to that hearing, I requested that the Internal Revenue Service [IRS] provide quarterly status reports on examination and collection actions involving television ministries. I would like to share with my colleagues the report which summarizes IRS's examination and collection activity in this area during the last quarter of 1988.

The IRS reported on the 23 cases which were in progress from October through December 1988. In one case involving a prominent evangelist, the Service has reached agreement on Federal tax issues for the years 1980 through 1983, including the payment of Federal income tax, interest and penalties in excess of $1 million. Issues examined in this case included inurement, private benefit and unreported income. Investigation of these issues involved the review of compensation and benefits, housing and transportation provided by the organization.

Further, the Service reported that they expect several other cases involving prominent television ministers will move to the final stages of examination this year. The Service anticipates that some of these cases will present serious issues relating to continuation of the organization's Federal tax exemption.

The full report from Robert I. Brauer, Assistant Commissioner (Employee Plans and Exempt Organizations), Internal Revenue Service, follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY, INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, D.C., March 8, 1989.

Hon. J.J. PICKLE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Oversight, Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This constitutes the publicly disclosable report on Internal Revenue Service actions involving media evangelists during the fourth quarter of 1988. More recent information is included where appropriate. Information, the public disclosure of which is precluded by IRC 6103, will be provided under separate cover.

The Service is continuing to devote significant examination resources to media evangelist cases, particularly the six examination projects involving prominent television evangelists described in our report to you dated December 5, 1988. The degree of cooperation received by the Service varies from case to case and, in one case involving a prominent evangelist, the Service has reached agreement on Federal tax issues for the years 1980 through 1983, including payment of substantial Federal income tax, interest, and penalties. In a second case, however, the Service has had to resort to summons enforcement to obtain production of books and records of the sort that have been voluntarily provided by other evangelists. That summons enforcement action involves a request for corporate minutes of the Freedom Council and the National Freedom Institute and was filed in U.S. District Court in Norfolk, Virginia, on February 13, 1989. We anticipate that several other cases involving prominent media evangelists will move to the final stages of the examination process this year. We also anticipate that some of these cases will present serious issues relating to continued Federal income tax exemption.

We have enclosed an updated chart of media evangelist cases that were open during the fourth quarter of 1988. Cases reported as closed on the earlier chart in our December 5, 1988 report have been dropped from this updated chart. We will continue to provide you with additional reports on a quarterly basis.

Sincerely,

ROBERT I. BRAUER.

Enclosure.

EXAMINATIONS OF MEDIA EVANGELISTS AND RELATED ORGANIZATIONS

[Status as of Dec. 31, 1988]

Taxpayer	Issue	Status
1.	Unreported income (reported income not commensurate with life style).	The Criminal Investigation Division began an information gathering project in March 1987 based on an informant's letter. The project has been completed and the case has been referred to the Department of Justice for grand jury action and accepted by.
2.	Unreported income and employment taxes.	The examination began in September 1985 after the minister failed to file Forms 1040, 940, and 941. The Collection Division has secured employment tax returns and taxes due. If individual returns are not voluntarily filed, the case will be referred to Examination and/or Criminal Investigation Division.
3.	Unreported income on Form 1040; false statements on return.	Examination of individual resulted in referral to Criminal Investigation Division. The case was subsequently referred to the Department of Justice for prosecution. Information was filed in U.S. District Court in October 1988.
4.	Political activities, commercial activity, inurement, unreported income.	The examination was begun with an affiliated organization. Agents are on-site interviewing third parties as well as members of the organization's executive staff. The agents have reviewed the program content of the TV broadcasts and are discussing their findings with the organization, as well as activities that may have been conducted primarily for political purposes. The estimated completion date for the examination phase is June 1989.
5.	Unreported income	The Forms 1040 for 1978–84 were examined and "church" income was determined to be personal income. The case is currently in the Collection Division and collection activity is in progress. The estimated completion date is March 1989.

Taxpayer	Issue	Status
6.	Failure to pay taxes	Forms 941 were filed for 3 quarters but no employment tax payments were made. The organization paid the outstanding interest and has requested abatement of penalties. The estimated closing date is March 1989. The penalties issue is presently under consideration in the Appeals Divison.
7.	Failure to pay employment taxes.	Forms 941 were filed but no payments were made. The taxpayer is now current in payments and has arranged a payment agreement for back taxes. The estimated completion date is March 1989.
8.	Political activity, lobbying, inurement.	The cases have been assigned to an agent who contacted the taxpayer in June, 1988. The Form 990–T of an affiliated entity has been selected as part of the EO TCMP program and will be worked accordingly. The agents are collecting additional information on nonexempt activities. Due to the expected complexity of the case the estimated closing date is December 1989. An examination team of exempt organizations agents, income tax agents, and a computer audit specialist has been assembled.
9.	Unreported income	The examination of the Form 1040 was begun in December 1985 as a result of computer scoring. The organization's funds were transferred to a second organization for the benefit of the minister. The case has been forwarded to the Appeals Division.
10.	Employment tax	The Collection Divison is attempting to secure delinquent Forms 941. The organization is making payments but refuses to provide financial information. The District anticipates applying penalties in early 1989.
11.	Unreported income	The examination of the minister's Form 1040 was begun as a result of a newspaper article on the minister. Examination contact has been made; however, the taxpayer has been uncooperative. The EP/EO Division has prepared a church tax inquiry letter on the minister's church and is awaiting Regional Commissioner approval. The estimated completion date is December 1990.
12.	Unsubstantiated deductions.	The Form 1040 was selected for examination by computer scoring. The examination was started October 1987. The case has been closed with a payment of $3,000 taxes and penalties.
13.	UBIT, relationship between a related IRC 501(c) entity and the church; possible inurement; and, consolidated return issues.	Analysis of Form 990–T indicates that the church may be improperly using an affiliated IRC 501(c) entity. The EP/EO Division began an examination of the related entity in March 1988. The examination may expand to include additional related organizations. Any expansion of the examination to include the church will be conducted under the Church Examination Procedures of IRC 7611. The District has requested technical advice from the National Office on the consolidated return issues. The District continues to examine the primary records of the organization.
14.	Inurement	A church examination letter under IRC 7611 has been issued and a conference held. The District continues to gather information and is evaluating the best way to proceed. This is a coordinated examination involving both EP/EO and Examination Divisions.
15.	Inurement, private benefit, unreported income, UBIT, church status.	The hearing on the IRS proof of claim in the Bankruptcy Court has been postponed. An action has been filed on behalf of a secured creditor to liquidate the assets of the organization. Civil suits and counter suits between the organization and its founders are ongoing.
16.	Inurement, private benefit, political activity, church status.	An IRC 7611 notice of inquiry was sent in August 1987, the notice of examination was sent in November 1987. The on-site phase began in January 1988. The primary issue is inurement to the benefit of the founder and his family. A review of the corporate books and records for 1984, 1985, and 1986, was completed in September 1988. The agents are evaluating the information and expect to request technical advice on exemption issues.

Taxpayer	Issue	Status
17.	Inurement, unreported income.	The EP/EO Division has determined that an examination should be conducted as a result of an information gathering project. The case will be assigned to an agent when personnel become available.
18.	Inurement	The EP/EO Division has initiated an information gathering project as a result of a referral from the Criminal Investigation Division. Since it is still in the information gathering process we are unable to provide an estimated completion date.
19.	Inurement, private benefit, unreported income.	Closing agreement on the years 8007 through 8307 has been reached. Subsequent years will be examined.
20.	Inurement; private benefit; allocation of expenses.	Examination of Form 1040 initiated as a TCMP selection. Issues involve use of "church" assets by the minister. The case has been closed with the reporting of additional income on the minister's tax return.
21.	Nonpayment of corporate income taxes.	After making a series of payments toward tax liability on Forms 941 and 1120, the organization ceased all further contact with collection personnel. Collection activity is in progress. Subsequently, the taxpayer reduced its outstanding balance substantially. Contact has resumed. The estimated completion date is March 1989.
22.	Nonpayment of employment and income taxes; fraud potential, both individual and corporate.	This case was initiated as a result of nonpayment of taxes due on Form 941. It is currently in Collection but a referral to Examination Division is pending and informal contact has been made with the Criminal Investigation Division. Collection activity is in progress. The estimated completion date is March 1989. However, we have determined that the taxpayer is not a media evangelist and therefore, it will be dropped from future reports.
23.	Other income; miscellaneous expenses.	This is an Office Examination case of a computer selected 1986 Form 1040. The taxpayer was initially contacted by letter in June 1988. Adjustments have been proposed. The estimated completion date is June 1989.

H.R. 5 WILL THREATEN U.S. TECHNOLOGY GAINS

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that it has not been reviewed by any House committee in the 101st Congress, H.R. 5, otherwise known as the Bryant bill, may soon come to the floor of the House for a vote.

In addition to the fact that this is a completely undemocratic procedure, the bill itself is a dangerous and unneeded piece of legislation that, if enacted, will inevitably backfire on U.S. workers and the U.S. economy. Giving away proprietary business information of foreign investors will only drive them to other countries. Why? Because no other major economic power discloses this kind of information.

What kind of investment benefits will be injured by H.R. 5? I am placing in the RECORD today a copy of a February 24, 1989, Wall Street Journal article which describes how foreign investors are providing the venture capital for U.S. high technology businesses that do not show a profit for long periods.

The article confirms the fact that foreign investment helps the U.S. create new jobs, new technologies, and new American entrepreneurs. If we choose to discourage foreign investment, which H.R. 5 would do, then we would be choosing to forgo these benefits. Do we want to do that? I don't think so. I urge my colleagues to defeat H.R. 5 when it comes to a vote. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

PATIENT MONEY—UNITED STATES FIRMS FIND ASIAN INVESTORS ARE WILLING TO WAIT FOR RETURNS

(By Marj Charlier)

There is money, and there is patient money. If you are an entrepreneur starting a business or trying to make it grow, patient money is better—and the best place to look for it now is across the Pacific.

Tu Chen, chairman of Komag Inc., a Milpitas, Calif., maker of high-quality hard disks for computers, is one of a growing number of stateside entrepreneurs who have been mining the heaps of patient money piled up in Japan. Mr. Chen, an American citizen, founded the company in 1983 with an initial boost from domestic venture capital, but since then he has relied increasingly on the Japanese. He's not sorry.

Last year Komag, suffering growth pains, didn't improve earnings from the second quarter to the third. Expecting stair-step growth in profits, a lot of U.S. stockholders (the company went public in 1987) bailed out, and the stock fell about 25%. The Japanese? Not to worry, said Asahi Glass Co., Komag's principal backer in Japan, which promptly raised its investment in the company from $4 million to $24 million. It is now interested in putting in much more.

"American industry doesn't have the patience the Japanese have," says Mr. Chen. He gets no argument from Francis Rowe, executive vice president of Colorocs Inc. That Georgia-based company couldn't get backing from U.S. sources, Mr. Rowe says, because they felt returns from its innovative color printing process would be too slow in coming. Mitsubishi Corp. and Sharp Corp. took a longer view—and the first copiers using Colorocs' technology are now being produced by Sharp in Japan.

The patience exhibited by the Japanese reflects an investment purpose radically different than that of most U.S. venture capitalists. The later usually want to push a company quickly into narrowly focused commercial production, so they can cash out at a profit. But the Japanese are more interested in getting equity in promising ideas, and developing them fully, than they are in a quick killing on a stock sale.

"The Japanese are looking for a return on technology, not a return on investment. And they're investing here because [the U.S.] is the primary entrepreneurial country," says Mark Radtke, a consultant with Venture Economics Inc. In 1983, he adds, there were only 11 Japanese corporate investments in American startup companies; by 1987 there were 48.

More and more companies like Komag are turning to Japan for second and third round financings. Komag raised its initial $5.5 million stake from U.S. investors led by Hambro International Venture Fund, but the next $16 million came from Asahi Glass and other Japanesse concerns. After the public offering (which raised $34 million), Asahi invested still more. All told, Japanese partners own nearly 17% of Komag now, and their total stake could amount to nearly 30% with more Asahi investments in the offing.

U.S. entrepreneurs say that the Japanese are often willing to pay more for a piece of their companies than stateside concerns are, which is certainly one reason why businessmen here are looking more often toward Japan. But Japanese industrial financiers bring much more to the party than just deep pockets.

They have excess production capacity that may be hard to find in the states, access to Asian market, an expertise in manufacturing that leads the world and a willingness to back research and development that is a frequently lacking among bottom-liners in the U.S. These things are just as attractive to many U.S. companies as the money the Japanese put up.

Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., for example, had excess manufacturing capacity that Solbourne Computer Inc., couldn't afford to build itself, along with the advanced robotics and other factory technology that was needed to produce at high quality and volume. So Solbourne, based in Boulder, Colo., recently sold a 53% stake in itself to Matsushita. The latter will build in Japan components for computer work stations that will be assembled and sold in the U.S. by Solbourne.

Komag's Mr. Chen, too, wanted much more than cash. He wanted production expertise, research and development support, and an entry into the Japanese market itself. "You don't go into Japan on your own," he says. So far, he has gotten all he sought.

Asahi is separately funding Komag attempts to develop an advanced glass computer disk and is working with it on a removable hard disk that some computer makers are considering for their future machines. Also, Asahi and Vacuum Metallurgial Co., another Japanese investor in the American disk maker, put up all the money for a joint venture that is producing disks in Japan; Komag got a half interest for contributing its technology and patents.

Feeling the need to diversify into businesses with high growth potential, Japanese companies in mature industries like glass, farm implements and steel (Kobe Steel Ltd. is another Komag backer) are particularly attracted to American high-tech opportunities. So, more outfits such as Kubota Ltd., a big Japanese agricultural-equipment concern, can be found grazing in places like the Silicono Valley.

Kubota now has a minority stake in Ardent Computer Corp., a maker of supercomputers with enhanced graphics capabilities that got its first round of financing in the states, and is making computer work stations for Ardent. Kubota isn't getting rich doing it, says Matt Sanders, vice president for operations at Ardent. "This is not an immediate kind of thing for them," he adds. "They're interested in a return on future business."

While Japan Inc.'s interest in American companies is certainly pleasing to the entrepreneurs who started them, it has also raised the hackles of some U.S. politicans, academicians and venture capitalists. They worry that American ideas are being sold to Japan too cheaply, transferring U.S.-born technology overseas and further advancing Japan's manufacturing prowess.

"This means a transfer of jobs away from the U.S.," says Vin Prothro, general managing partner at Southwest Enterprise Associates, a Dallas-based venture-capital firm. "We're losing out on critical manufacturing technology."

However, U.S. businessmen who have attracted Japanese investment argue that technology is flowing both ways. Japanese companies, they point out, are providing manufacturing know-how that is improving U.S. plants. Mr. Chen, for one, notes that Asahi Glass has already helped Komag automate its production lines in Milpitas and adds that improvements developed in Japan will be showing up in new disk-making machines the company will add there.

"We all have a teamwork mentality," says Mr. Chen, who, like others, believe that more American-Japanese alliances are inevitable. "It's the future," he declares.

THE MARYLAND STATE ASSOCIATION OF B'NAI B'RITH ANNUAL CONVENTION

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 18 and Sunday, March 19, 1989, the Maryland State Association of B'nai B'rith will conduct its annual convention. B'nai B'rith is the oldest and one of the largest service organizations in the world and has developed and implemented programs throughout the United States and around the world. Founded almost 146 years ago, B'nai B'rith projects and philanthropy impact on the lives of millions of people.

This organization is an outstanding example of America's distinctive characteristic—voluntarism. By merging voluntary action with community service, B'nai B'rith has achieved a reputation as a major benevolent force throughout the world. For more than 71 years, men and women members of B'nai B'rith in Maryland have perpetuated the tradition of community service by conducting programs for disabled persons, working in hospitals and police stations, sponsoring housing and programs for senior citizens, and providing programs for young people.

As we all know, organizations such as B'nai B'rith are effective because of dedicated members who participate actively and provide distinguished leadership.

One such person is Steven G. Tapper, who will be discharged as the 1988-89 president of the Maryland State Association after completing a highly successful term.

Another exceptional member, Stuart I. Goldman, will be installed as the 1989-90 president of the Maryland State Association.

Many other B'nai B'rith leaders will be participating in the convention, including international leaders Judge Paul L. Backman and Neil C. Rosen, and district 5 leaders Dr. Henry Ray Wengrow, Fred Snyder, Bruce Raskin, Dr. Samuel Friedman, and Stanley Joffe.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honor to call the Maryland State Association of B'nai B'rith to the attention of my colleagues. Thanks to organizations such as B'nai B'rith and individuals like those being honored, our efforts as public servants are extended much further and are enhanced through the experience of public and private sector cooperation.

THE BEECHMONT WOMAN'S CLUB: 50 PROUD YEARS

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to pay tribute to the Beechmont Woman's Club of Louisville, KY, which in 1989 will celebrate its 50th anniversary of service to the Beechmont community.

The spirit of voluntarism and exemplary service to one's community could find no better model than that of the Beechmont Woman's Club [BWC] and its record of civic contributions.

In 1939 the Beechmont community was a relatively young neighborhood of what could only be described as solid, working class citizens in Louisville's South End. The character and pride of the community's residents have remained steadfast over the years. Armed with these basic qualities the Beechmont Woman's Club—more than 200 members strong—has made an outstanding commitment to helping others less fortunate.

Many worthy young men and women of Beechmont have been afforded the opportunity to further their education in high school and onto college through the BWC's student scholarship fund.

Annual donations have also enabled needy school kids to be outfitted with new clothes as they begin the first years of their educational experience. In another activity, BWC members last year provided eye screening tests for more than 800 Beechmont pre-school kindergarten children. The Beechmont Woman's Club also lends its assistance to cancer patients, and, each month organizes various activities for the senior citizen residents of a local nursing home.

The kind of dedication and active service to one's neighbors and community demonstrated by the Beechmont Woman's Club merits the highest order of praise. I salute the Beechmont Woman's Club on the occasion of its golden anniversary. And, I extend every best wish for another 50 years of success for the Beechmont Woman's Club.

A TRIBUTE TO GEORGE RENCH

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Mr. George Rench, the retiring president of the Village of Stickney.

Mr. Rench has dedicated his life to the improvement of Stickney. He moved there as a very young boy, married his wife Adeline, raised his son Brian, and contributed in countless ways to the entire community.

George Rench's history of service to Stickney spans a lifetime. He served as a trustee of the Village of Stickney from 1949 to 1964 when he was elected president. He has served Stickney faithfully as president since then.

George Rench has been a tireless public servant in many capacities. He was the president of the Stickney Memorial Association from 1943 to 1948. He served as Boy Scouts committeeman from 1948 to 1955. He was director of the Community Chest from 1946 until 1964. George Rench served as president of the Stickney-Forest View Lions Club for 1 year. He served for 7 years as the president of the Independent Citizens Club. He was president of the Stickney Police Association for 15 years.

George Rench has contributed his energies to many vital public service organizations. He has served as a local chairman for the American Red Cross, the Heart Fund, and the Cancer Society. He has been a member of the Associated Public Safety Communication Officers, and the West Suburban Executive Breakfast Club. He remains a member of the West Central Municipal Conference.

Until his retirement in 1976, George Rench was a manager with the International Harvester Co.

For his lifelong dedication, George Rench has received many well-deserved honors. In 1972 he was named "Man of the Year" by the Stickney Businessmen's Association. In 1980 he was named "Citizen of the Year" by the Stickney Baseball Association. In 1982, in recognition of his dedication and effective public service, the Stickney Baseball Association named and dedicated a new baseball complex "George B. Rench Park."

Until his retirement in 1976, George Rench was a manager with the International Harvester Co.

George Rench and his wife Adeline have four grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, this record of dedicated public service to the people of Stickney deserves recognition and praise. It is with great pleasure that I rise to ask my colleagues and his many friends in wishing George Rench the very best as he begins his well-deserved retirement from the presidency of the Village of Stickney.

TELEMARKETING FRAUD PREVENTION ACT OF 1989, H.R. 1354

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. THOMAS A. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, legitimate telemarketing is a $100 billion a year industry. But telemarketing fraud is a blight on this industry. The Federal Trade Commission estimates that there is $1 billion a year of telemarketing fraud, and I have seen estimates that telemarketing fraud may be as high as $20 billion a year.

Last June the House passed by voice vote, under suspension, the Telemarketing Fraud Prevention Act of 1988, H.R. 4101. While the Senate Subcommittee on Consumer held a hearing last September on H.R. 4101—and two other bills dealing with telemarketing fraud—the Senate took no further action on the bill.

Last year's bill was endorsed by numerous consumer groups: the National Consumers League, Bank Card Holders of America, Center for Science in the Public Interest, Consumer Federation of America, Consumers Union, and Public Citizen's Congress Watch. It was also endorsed by MasterCard, VISA, the National Office Machine Dealers Association, the National Tour Association, the American Society of Travel Agents, and the National Association of Attorneys General.

Last week I introduced the Telemarketing Fraud Prevention Act of 1989, H.R. 1354. It is cosponsored by Mr. WHITTAKER, the ranking Republican on our subcommittee, and by nine other members of the Subcommittee on Transportation and Hazardous Materials: Mr. BATES, Mr. RINALDO, Mr. ECKART, Mr. TAUKE, Mr. FLORIO, Mr. MANTON, Mr. SIKORSKI, Mr. SLATTERY, and Mr. SWIFT.

Both last year's bill and the Telemarketing Fraud Prevention Act of 1989 have the same essential features: First, direct the FTC to promulgate within 180 days a rule on telemarketing, similar to the FTC's rules on door-to-door sales and mail order sales that were promulgated in the 1970's; second, authorize State attorneys general to sue in Federal court those who either violate the FTC rule or commit fraudulent telemarketing; third, authorize private citizens, such as MasterCard and VISA, to sue in Federal court those who either violate the FTC rule or commit fraudulent telemarketing, and fourth, prohibit oral harassment of customers by telemarketers, and (5) have the FTC set up a consumer clearinghouse for telemarketing.

The FTC told our subcommittee in January that since 1982 the FTC has brought 32 Federal court actions against telemarketing scams and actually recovered about $23 million for consumers. That means the FTC is recovering for consumers less than 1 percent of what they're actually losing. Moreover, $15 million of what the FTC has actually recovered—more than half of all that it has actually recovered—was obtained in a single action brought in 1983. In other words, in cases brought since 1984 the FTC has gotten back only $8 million for consumers.

The FTC has committed a rapidly growing amount of its resources to combatting telemarketing fraud. In fiscal year 1983 the FTC spent about $410,000 on telemarketing cases; this rose to $2.3 million in fiscal year 1988, and the FTC staff expects to spend $4.8 million on telemarketing investigations in this fiscal year. Since the FTC only has about $38 million for all law enforcement activities this year—including all its merger matters—the staff is proposing to devote about 13 percent of the FTC's entire law enforcement resources to telemarketing cases.

The FTC clearly cannot do the job alone. The victims of telemarketing fraud are not impressed by the FTC's performance and want Congress to act.

Meanwhile, the States, using State law, are also going after fraudulent telemarketing. The National Association of Attorneys General told our subcommittee last year that in 1987 the States had brought over 100 telemarketing cases. But each State attorney general, using State law, can only get relief for the citizens of his own State.

Let me illustrate the problem. The FTC sued Mytel International in Federal court in the fall of 1987 over an office supply scam, and in the fall of 1988 a settlement was reached. Yet North Carolina had obtained an injunction against Mytel in 1984, and Illinois had obtained one against Mytel in early 1987. But neither of these two States, which relied on State law, could get national relief, and the FTC investigated Mytel for 3 years before it sued. Let me give one more example. The FTC sued Amy Travel in Federal court in August 1987 for a travel scam. But 6 States—Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, and Texas—had each already sued Amy earlier in 1987.

Thus, the States can frequently move more quickly against telemarketing fraud than can the FTC, but the States, relying on State law, cannot get the same relief that the FTC can. Our bill solves this problem, and also helps avoid duplicative State and Federal investigations of the same firm, by permitting a State to sue in Federal court. Encouraging a State to sue in Federal court under Federal law will also reduce the risk of inconsistent decisions by State courts applying State law, since in the Federal court system the Courts of Appeal can ensure that the Federal courts in different States apply the law in a uniform manner.

The Telemarketing Fraud Prevention Act of 1989 has several features to protect against frivolous State or private suits. The bill provides that the FTC must be notified of any State or private action and has the automatic right to intervene. Furthermore, if the State attorney general or private plaintiff alleges a violation of the FTC's telemarketing rules and the FTC tells the Federal court that the defendant did not violate the FTC's rules, then the court must give conclusive weight to the FTC's views. The FTC's views are, however, given no special weight on an allegation that the defendant has committed telemarketing fraud. This bill also has a narrower definition of telemarketing than last year's bill in order to make it clear that it does not cover such things as ordering a pizza. Finally, the minimum amount for a private action has been increased from $10,000 to $50,000, which is the same amount now required in Federal court for a diversity suit.

A combination of Federal, State, and private enforcement of Federal law is used in combating commodity fraud and odometer fraud and has long been used in the antittrust laws and in some environment laws, such as the Solid Waste Disposal Act and the Noise Control Act.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, a combined Federal, State and private attack on telemarketing fraud will bring quicker and more effective enforcement, save scarce Federal dollars, and provide for more uniformity in enforcement. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

FRIENDLY SONS OF ST. PATRICK CELEBRATE 75th ANNIVERSARY

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, of Pittston, PA, who will be celebrating their 75th anniversary this year.

The Friendly Sons of St. Patrick is an organization devoted to the preservation of the values brought to America by Irish immigrants. Because our country is a melting pot of so many different cultures, it sometimes happens that ethnic groups lose part of their cultural heritage and identity in the process of assimilating into American culture. But the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick keep the Irish spirit alive for the many individuals of Irish descent who have settled in northeastern Pennsylvania. The language, songs, dances, and arts of the Irish people are enthusiastically practiced so that future generations may share in the proud heritage of their ancestors.

The Friendly Sons of St. Patrick, who have met every St. Patrick's Day for these past 75 years, usually mark the occasion with a guest of honor and a special award for an outstanding Irish-American. This year's guest of honor is Pennsylvania Governor Robert P. Casey, a good friend and native son of northeastern Pennsylvania. Governor Casey joins such distinguished names as Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, Senator Robert F. Kennedy, and President Harry S. Truman in being the Pittston Friendly Sons' guest of honor. This year's outstanding Irish-American is Maj. Michael Jordan, the area 2 commander of the Pennsylvania State Police. I am proud to join with the Friendly Sons in saluting Major Jordan and the other honorees, who have contributed much to Pennsylvania and the country.

This year the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick will be initiating a scholarship program for students in the Pittston area. The Jack Brennan Scholarship—named for a gentleman who has served the Friendly Sons as Secretary for 17 years—will provide $1,000 for a needy college student from the greater Pittston area. This scholarship, which will be awarded every year hereafter, will provide hope and help for students who might not otherwise be able to afford a college education. I salute this effort and am proud to be associated with this program.

Mr. Speaker, the Friendly Sons of St. Patrick deserve our special attention and praise. The members of this organization seek not only to preserve our diverse cultural past, but also set their sights toward a brighter future for America.

DEFICIT REDUCTION IS CONGRESS' RESPONSIBILITY

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, like many other Members of Congress, I was disappointed that the National Economic Commission was unable to come to a compromise and present us with a plan to reduce the deficit.

The failings of the Commission only mirror the failings of this body, however. For many years, Congress stood by and allowed deficits to skyrocket and then hoped that a hastily formed commission would give it political cover to avoid the pain of deficit reduction.

With the publication of the Commission's fractious and generally inconclusive report comes the realization that Congress cannot duck the deficit issue any longer. Deficit reduction is Congress' responsibility.

The ball is now squarely in our court and that is where it will stay. The only course of action left is for Members on both sides of the aisle to accept the President's invitation to bring to the bargaining table their priority programs and sacred cows and negotiate real deficit reduction.

VETERANS LOSE A GOOD FRIEND

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I report to my colleagues the passing of a dedicated and highly respected public servant, Hugh E. Davis, the director of the Veterans' Administration Medical Center at Salem, VA. Hugh died March 5 in Richmond of a heart attack.

Just last September, Representative JIM OLIN and I met with Hugh in his office at the VA hospital to discuss health care matters of concern to regional veterans. Hugh was down-to-earth, straight-shooting, and very efficient. And you just couldn't find a more likable fellow. He is going to be missed not only at the hospital but throughout the Virginia veteran community and in the Halls of Congress where he maintained a very cooperative working relationship with those of us involved in veterans' affairs.

Hugh Davis' career in service to his country began in 1942, prior to a 3-year hitch in the Army. Following his separation from the military, he continued to further his education as he worked his way up through the VA system in a series of fiscal, accounting, and administrative positions in Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, South Dakota, Washington, DC, and eventually Salem, VA, where he was appointed medical center director in 1972, a position he held until his death. Since 1980, he had served as associate dean of the school of medicine at the University of Virginia. Hugh was very actively involved in civic affairs.

Mr. Speaker, Hugh Davis did an outstanding job for the veterans of this Nation. I know my colleagues will want to join with me in extending our sympathy to his family and in making known our appreciation for his contributions to improved quality in veterans' health care. His is quite a legacy of distinguished public service.

TRIBUTE TO JOYCE KALE-PESTA

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, it is with great honor that I stand here today to pay tribute to one of the most extraordinary citizens of my 17th District, Mrs. Joyce Kale-Pesta.

Joyce was born in Youngstown, OH, and is the daughter of Elizabeth "Bessie" Spangel. She is an outstanding woman who participates in community activities with great frequency. She is the financial secretary of the Ladies A.O.H. and serves as the chairperson of the L.A.O.H. Ways and Means Committee. She serves as secretary to the Pete Gabriel's St. Patricks Day Parade, is on the committee for the Ursuline Alumni Irish Show and is a member of the Youngstown area Feis Society. She is also a member of St. Edward's Parish.

In addition, Joyce is very active in the Mahoning County Democratic Party and has served under Chairman Don L. Hanni for the past 11 years. She is a member of the John F. Kennedy Federated Democratic Women's Club, the Federated Democratic Women of Ohio, and the Tri-County Democratic Organization. As acknowledgement for both her exemplary efforts and unsurmountable dedication, Joyce was honored as the Democratic Woman of the Year in 1988.

Joyce is also very proud of her family. Her husband Thomas J. Pesta and her four wonderful sons, Robb Kale, Gregory Kale, Geoffrey Kale and Eric Pesta, have provided the love and support necessary throughout the years.

Joyce Kale-Pesta's unvarying perseverance, devotion and patience should serve as a model for all to follow. And, it is with great pride that I stand here today to congratulate her as well as to wish her well in all future endeavors.

EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE—H.R. 1231

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 13, 1989

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, on March 9, the Committee on Public Works and Transportation reported H.R. 1231 to establish a Presidential emergency board to investigate the labor dispute at Eastern Airlines.

The minority position on this legislation follows as well as two pertinent editorials.

MINORITY VIEWS

This legislation would mandate the establishment of a Presidential Emergency Board (PEB) under the Railway Labor Act (45 U.S.C. 151) to deal with the dispute between Eastern Airlines and its unions. In our view, the establishment of such a Board is not justified on either legal or policy grounds.

Under the Railway Labor Act (RLA), the President has the discretion to appoint a PEB if the labor dispute "threaten(s) substantially to interrupt interstate commerce to a degree such as to deprive any section of the country of essential transportation service." Since the late sixties, the government has not viewed a single-carrier strike in the airlines industry as threatening such an interruption. This was, no doubt, due to the fact that other carriers were available to provide the essential transportation services.

What was not justified then is even less justified now. Since the advent of airline deregulation, airlines have been free to adjust their routes in response to passenger demand. Indeed, in this case, some airlines have increased their flights to accommodate passengers. Others already fly Eastern's routes and have accepted tickets of Eastern's passengers. Although there is certainly inconvenience to passengers, there is not the deprivation of essential transportation service that would justify a PEB under the statute.

We recognize that the use of secondary picketing, which some unions have threatened, could cause the sort of disruption that the statute was meant to prevent. If a serious disruption in transportation occurs as a result of secondary picketing, however, the appropriate solution is to prohibit such picketing rather than to establish a PEB. The Nation's economy and the movement of its people and goods should not be held hostage by the picketing of companies that have nothing to do with the dispute. This could not be done in any other American industry because Federal labor laws put severe restrictions on this sort of secondary picketing. Thus, the way to prevent the disruption created by secondary picketing is to eliminate secondary picketing.

Notwithstanding the fact that the law speaks only in terms of disruption of commerce, proponents of a PEB urge adoption of this legislation in order to save Eastern Airlines and prevent the disruption to its employees that would be caused by the loss of their jobs. We share their fervent hope for the survival of Eastern and feel just as deeply for the agony being experienced by Eastern's many fine employees. However, we believe their faith in a PEB as the way to solve this problem is sorely misplaced.

The parties have been in mediation under the auspices of the National Mediation Board (NMB) for over a year without coming close to an agreement. There is no reason to believe that they will do any better under another Board, the PEB, during the short timeframe set forth in the legislation. The Board has no power to mandate a solution. It can only recommend. In all likelihood, the recommendations of the PEB would be rejected by one or both of the parties. This would put the dispute right back to where it is now, with an airline that is much weaker for having to endure the further delay.

Of course, Congress could always make the PEB's recommendations mandatory by enacting legislation to that effect. But that would put it in the awkward position of forcing a resolution that management feels would bankrupt the company or that labor would refuse to live with, or both. In that event, the intolerable labor-management situation at Eastern would simply be perpetuated. In this connection, it is important to note that neither Eastern nor the machinist's union have agreed to be bound by the recommendations of the PEB.

Moreover, the unions have made it quite clear that the real problem here is Frank Lorenzo, the head of Eastern's parent, Texas Air. If Frank Lorenzo is their problem, a PEB cannot be their solution. Whatever this Board can accomplish, it cannot change Eastern's ownership. Therefore, even if its recommendations were accepted, the source of all the employees' anger would still remain.

On March 9, 1989, the company filed for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code. Eastern's present intentions are to operate the shuttle and several South American routes. This new development in the labor dispute has further complicated a very complex set of labor questions which we frankly do not believe a Presidential Emergency Board would be prepared to deal with. Furthermore, in our opinion, there are simply too many unanswered legal questions which have arisen because of the bankruptcy to proceed at this time.

The bill requires, pursuant to Section 10 of the RLA, that during the investigation by the board and for the cooling off period that follows its report, no change, except by consent of the parties, "shall be made . . . in the conditions out of which the dispute arose" (45 U.S.C. 160). In other words, union employees are eligible for the same wages and working conditions that were in effect prior to the strike.

The Committee has scrambled to report this legislation without making an adequate analysis of its effects on the requirement for a return to the status quo. Enactment of this legislation could pose both legal and practical problems for a prompt resolution of the dispute.

It is unclear what a return to the status quo means with respect to the rights of the workers. It is our understanding that the company intends to honor the expired contracts of the Airline Pilots Association (ALPA) and the Transport Workers Union (TWU). However, under the provisions of the RLA, the company is now free to pay the International Association of Machinists' (IAM) members whatever it sees fit and has the right to change working conditions. The machinists' pay, of course, is the major issue in this dispute.

Does this legislation require the company to bring all workers back at full pay whether or not there is a job for them to perform? Or, does the company bring them back and go through furlough procedures to lay them off. Currently, the company is operating about six percent of the normal number of flights. Obviously, it will take time for the company to put additional flights in service. If pilots are brought back on an as-needed basis, what are the seniority rights of these workers? Do pilots have to be retrained to fly different aircraft because of seniority requirements? If this is the case, retraining will take time.

These same questions could be posed for the flight attendants, machinists, baggage handlers, and cleaners. If the company must bring all workers back immediately, whether or not there is a job for them to do, there may be serious adverse economic consequences to this bankrupt carrier.

Also, there is the question of potential constitutional infirmities. It is unclear whether this legislation would survive scrutiny under Article I, section 8, clause 4 of the U.S. Constitution which gives Congress the power "To establish . . . "uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States." The recent case of Railway Labor Executives Association v. Gibbons, 455 U.S. 457 (1982), raises substantial questions about its applicability to the situation at Eastern Air Lines. In that case, Congress passed legislation requiring the Rock Island Railroad, which had filed for reorganization under the bankruptcy laws, to pay benefits to certain employees. The Supreme Court concluded that the uniformity requirement of the U.S. Constitution prohibits Congress from enacting bankruptcy laws that specifically apply to the affairs of only one named regional debtor.

Arguably, we may be violating this holding if we enact H.R. 1231 because the legislation requires that a specific company, Eastern Air Lines, which is in bankruptcy, return its employees to the wages and working conditions that existed prior to the strike.

Also, there are questions as to whether we are, in effect, modifying the rights of a Bankruptcy Judge to adjust collective bargaining agreements under the U.S. Bankruptcy Code. Today, the company is free to unilaterally set wages and working conditions for the members of the machinists union. This legislation, however, would obviously require a higher wage than what the company would be willing to pay today. The question is: does this return to the status quo affect or override the power of a Bankruptcy Judge to carry out his authority to change the terms, conditions, wages, benefits, or work rules for employees?

It can also be argued that the legislation constitutes an uncompensated taking of private property for a public purpose in violation of the Just Compensation Clause of the 5th Amendment. Courts have held that a "taking" occurs when three conditions exist: (1) the required action imposes a severe economic impact on the claimant; (2) it substantially interferes with financial expectations; and (3) the governmental action appropriates the claimants property for a public use. Penn Central Transportation Co. v. New York City, 438 U.S. 104 (1978). Certainly, these three conditions appear to exist with respect to Eastern.

Today, the company has implemented a wage scale below that which existed before the strike. If a Presidential Emergency Board is established and workers are returned to the pre-strike status quo, it can be argued that the IAM members are accorded a status in the bankruptcy proceeding that they do not now enjoy because they will be receiving much higher wages by the operation of the legislation. These wage levels are, of course, a major reason for the financial straits the company is in. This is certainly contrary to the expectations of the company and amounts to a governmental taking of the estate's assets to pay employees a higher wage.

Also, a related issue is whether this could potentially affect the rights of creditors in any liquidation situation and whether irreparable damage to the estate may result through a legislative requirement to return to the status quo. Conceivably, this may present a "taking" which requires the government to compensate the company.

In short, we believe that the best way to resolve this dispute and save Eastern Air Lines is to have both sides come together at the bargaining table and reach a mutually acceptable resolution. The only way this will ever happen is by the pressure put on the parties through the process of self-help and strikes that we have now reached. We recognize that this is a painful process for many. But it is a necessary one. The establishment of a PEB would only drag out this process that much longer.

We recognize that this bill would shorten the 60-day delay that is typical in Railway Labor Act cases but we believe this presents a false hope. Even under the 30-day limit in the current law, the average duration of a hearing involving past airline emergency boards was 75 days. One took 200 days. It is not realistic to expect the emergency board in this case to complete its work in the 14 or 19 days contemplated by H.R. 1231.

That is especially true here where the board would have to evaluate the cases of not just one but three unions, two of which have not even completed the negotiating process. And its task is further complicated by the fact that the company is in bankruptcy.

It should also be pointed out that this legislation would establish a questionable precedent because ALPA and TWU have not negotiated to the stage of impasse requiring the intervention of the NMB. In other words, this legislation bypasses the regular procedure for collective bargaining and mediation by requiring a PEB for two unions whose labor situation is not ripe for consideration by such an emergency board. This totally distorts the RLA process and may set the stage for further legislation and Congressional intervention in labor disputes before the collective bargaining process has had the chance to run its course.

It may be that Eastern will not survive. It will almost certainly not survive as we knew it. But if it dies, it should die as a result of its own failures, those of its management and its employees, and not because of ill-conceived government intervention.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 3, 1989]

SHOWDOWN FOR EASTERN

Neither Eastern Air Lines nor the machinists' union is entitled to much of your sympathy. Eastern is dominated by Frank Lorenzo, who has made a career and a fortune out of pushing down the wages of the people who work for his airlines. He wants a reduction of $150 million a year in the pay of the ground crews represented by the union, with the heaviest cuts falling on the baggage handlers. The union want raises amounting to $50 million a year from Eastern, an airline already running heavy losses, and it wants Congress to write a settlement into law.

Deregulation has led to heavy pressure downward on wages at all airlines, but most of them have managed to maintain a reasonably civilized atmosphere in dealing with their employees. Eastern was well known for poor labor relations before Mr. Lorenzo arrived, and since then they have turned dramatically worse. The next stage of this duel between them will proceed, unfortunately, under the Railway Labor Act, the provisions of which have little correspondence to the realities of the air travel industry.

The National Mediation Board has urged President Bush to appoint an emergency panel. The panel would recommend a settlement, and if the airline and the union refused to accept it voluntarily, Congress would enact it into law. This peculiar procedure was devised early in this century to protect innocent third parties—shippers and travelers—from the enormous losses that a rail strike threatened at a time when most people had no other means of transportation. Under deregulation, any airline can serve any airport.

The union says it will do its best to take as many innocent hostages as possible by running secondary boycotts against as many other airlines, and as many commuter railroads, as it can manage. Despite that risk of disruption, Mr. Bush and Congress have to stay out of this one.

Many people in the airline industry have suffered pay cuts, and even lost their jobs, as a result of deregulation. It would be utterly unfair for Congress now to rush in and legislate raises and job security for Eastern's machinists and baggage handlers. Perhaps Eastern will succeed in shedding the machinists' union. Perhaps the union will deliver the final fatal blow to Eastern. Both sides are in danger. But it's not the president's job to rescue them from the accumulated results of their own misjudgments and bad temper. In the deregulated airline industry, their fate is up to them.

LABOR THREATENS THE PRESIDENT

Like President Reagan before him, President Bush faces an early challenge from labor in the air transport industry. Mr. Reagan stood firm against a strike by air traffic controllers that could have grounded civil aviation. The question now is whether Mr. Bush will stand up with equal courage to unions that threaten to shut down the railroads unless the White House intervenes in their dispute with beleaguered Eastern Airlines.

The cost of appeasement could be enormous. If the President sides with labor, Eastern is likely to fail, which would sharply reduce price competition in the deregulated airline industry, and other transport unions would be encouraged to settle their disputes in the political marketplace.

Eastern has been battling with its unions for years, trying (and mostly failing) to reduce labor costs. Those costs are one reason Eastern has lost $1.4 billion since 1978. But the battle only turned ugly in 1986. The carrier's new owner, Texas Air, demanded concessions from baggage handlers, whose compensation averaged $45,000 a year. Eastern's unions struck back, with among other things, a public relations campaign, frightening passengers with allegations of safety violations.

The conflict probably would have been resolved last year when the baggage handlers' contract expired, forcing both sides to stare at the real chance of a strike. But under the Railway Labor Act, airline contracts remain in force until an obscure agency, the National Mediation Board, decides that collective bargaining has failed.

The board's two members delayed, unwilling to risk the wrath of labor's friends in Congress by freeing Eastern from contract provisions highly favorable to the baggage handlers. So for 13 months, Eastern had to absorb million-dollar-a-day losses, selling asssets to raise cash. Not till last month did the board finally declare an impasse, setting the stage for a strike or lockout on March 4.

Now organized labor has switched tactics. It is urging the White House to create an emergency mediation board. That would postpone a strike—and drain Eastern's cash—for 60 more days. Even if the airline weathered the delay, it might not survive subsequent pressure to settle on the panel's terms. In the past, such boards have recommended settlements at prevailing industry wages, far above the means of a deeply indebted airline operating primarily in low-fare markets.

If the President does not intervene, the A.F.L.-C.I.O. president, Lane Kirkland, threatens the public with more than the inconvenience of a work stoppage at Eastern. Labor, he warns, will disrupt vital transport links by staging sympathy strikes against railroads.

Mr. Kirkland is probably bluffing. Rail and airline unions are the only unions legally permitted to stage such secondary boycotts. But rail workers are not likely to risk losing this precious leverage in support of generously paid airline employees. Whether he is bluffing or not, capitulating to these demands could make the traveling public pay.

The failure of Eastern would knock out the carrier with the strongest incentive to build market share by lowering prices. And it would increase market concentration in an industry already dominated by a few airlines that cover high costs by charging high fares.

Beyond economic loss, any short-term political benefits the White House might gain by avoiding labor conflict would be overwhelmed by the cost of the precedent. If baggage handlers can blackmail Washington, why would any transport union hesitate to try drawing the President into its labor disputes? The best time to defend the principal of collective bargaining is before it has been violated. And that time is now.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, March 14, 1989, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, March 14, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

Rev. Dr. Mike Adams, First Baptist Church, Jasper, AL, offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we come to You now and ask Your blessing upon the proceedings in this place. We thank You, Lord, for the freedom that we enjoy, for the abundance of our country. We thank You also that You have allowed us to join together this day and conduct the business of this country. O Lord, we pray that You would bless each man that is here, each woman that is here, each person that has come together in order that they might have wisdom, they might have forthrightness, and moral integrity, in order that this job might be accomplished.

We pray these things in Jesus' name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAVENEL] kindly lead our colleagues in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. RAVENEL led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

ENCOURAGE DEBT-FOR-NATURE SWAP

(Mr. BATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, the National Audubon Society has recently released an excellent report on sustainable development in U.S. foreign assistance. The report describes the awesome effects of acid precipitation, global warming, ozone layer depletion, and widespread decertification of our planet, and suggests how we, the Congress, can help to resolve these environmental problems in developing nations.

Recently, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 44, a resolution calling on the World Bank and U.S. bank regulators to encourage banks to reduce the debt service burden of debtor nations in exchange for steps taken by the debtor nations to protect tropical rain forests and other natural resources.

If you believe banks share in the responsibility to protect the planet's finite resources and fragile atmosphere, while encouraging economic growth, then I encourage you to join me in responsibly dealing with the damage now occurring to the Earth's environment.

RECOGNITION OF THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SMITH-LEVER ACT

(Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, May 8 we will be celebrating the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act. It is a date worth celebrating because it marks the establishment of the Cooperative Extension Service.

The Cooperative Extension Service is a nationwide network, bringing educational assistance to every State and county in America on issues as critical as agricultural production, food supply, nutrition, water quality, natural resource management, and conservation.

It is a proven partnership of Federal, State, and county governments; and it is a conduit through which scientific and technological information flows from researchers at our land-grant universities and USDA to assist agriculture and to address both business and human needs of our communities.

Those of us directly involved in agriculture over the years know the full value of the Extension Service. Whether it is personal experience or that of a neighbor, there is story after story of the Extension Service coming to the rescue with information and a guiding hand.

One of my clearest memories of life as a young newly wed and a struggling, poor farmer is of chickens and the Extension Service.

My husband, Haven, and I were just kids trying to farm and raise a few chickens. One day we went out to the coop and chickens were literally falling off the roost. It was our county extension agent that taught us about cholera and how to prevent the chickens from contracting it. From there, we went on to raise an awarding winning flock of laying hens.

The help given us and the role it played in our success is repeated time and time again, day after day, by the professional staff and volunteers of the Extension Service. It is Government, working, out there directly benefiting the people. And it is a Government program we do not want to lose.

Later today the House will consider House Joint Resolution 124 to commemorate the anniversary of the Cooperative Extension Service, and I encourage my colleagues to give the resolution their enthusiastic support.

PROUD TO BE AN AMERICAN

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to express celebration of the 51st anniversary of my arrival in the United States and to express my appreciation to the people and the Government of the United States for their generosity.

On March 12, 1938, my mother of blessed memory, my sister, and I were aboard the SS President Harding, when it docked in New York Harbor. Not only has my life been completely transformed by America's generosity, in all likelihood, I would have been among the 6 million European Jews, including many members of my family, who were exterminated by the Nazis. As one of the lucky few who gained safe haven here, I continue to feel a special obligation to use my best interests on behalf of those whose freedom, and in many instances their very lives, are at risk from the tyrants who exercise power in far too many nations and regions of the world to this very day.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a citizen of a nation which considers concern for human rights as one of its fundamental principles, and I feel especially proud to be a Member of this distinguished body which gives voice and strength to those principles.

PRAISE FOR SECRETARY OF DEFENSE NOMINEE, THE HONORABLE DICK CHENEY

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, it is sometimes said that reading the Los Angeles Times is like being on the inside. That particular quality was especially evident in the Times March 12 editorial praising the President and his new nominee for Secretary of Defense, DICK CHENEY. The newspaper characterized the President's choice of our friend and colleague as "an inspired move," and described DICK CHENEY as "a natural" and "a bright, thoughtful conservative."

Mr. Speaker, my primary reason for rising here this morning is to pay tribute to DICK CHENEY and wish him the very best as he faces the serious challenges that lie ahead in managing the Defense Department. But I would also like to commend the Los Angeles Times for telling its readers what we in Congress have known all along: "President Bush and DICK CHENEY are winners and America is a better nation because of them."

ANOTHER GIVEAWAY TO JAPAN

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that the Bush administration has decided to give our F-16 fighter jet technology to Japan. I agree that NATO and Japan should be footing more of their own defense bill, but not this way.

Our taxpayers, the American people, have invested billions of dollars in research, and now we plan to give it away. This is crazy.

Let me remind Members that after World War II we invited the Japanese into our factories and into our steel mills, and we let them take photographs and go back home and spur the economy of Japan. They did that. They now have the factories, they have the steel mills, and we have photographs.

Is it not enough that the Japanese own more of America than Donald Trump? What is wrong with this House? Now we want to give them the fighter jet market as well. It is time for the Japanese to start earning it the old fashioned way, just like we did.

This is not defense policy. This is simply "giving away the farm," and I hope that DICK CHENEY will bring some sanity and common sense to this whole process.

THE FAMILY LIVING WAGE

(Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleagues, TOM PETRI and STEVE BARTLETT, for putting together a special order this evening to discuss new ways to help low-income Americans work their way up the economic ladder. While some would mandate a large increase in the minimum wage and ignore the dangers to the economy, STEVE BARTLETT and TOM PETRI have worked tirelessly to develop public policy proposals options which would allow families who have earned a wage to keep more of their income.

Mr. Speaker, we need to look carefully at our colleagues ideas to reform the earned income tax credit and create a family living wage. In this way, breadearners in families will be able to keep a greater share of their income—offsetting their FICA tax, and giving them an incentive to stay in the work force. A large increase in the minimum wage is a crude tool to make public policy because it mandates benefits for all, regardless of their skills, their training and their family needs. The family living wage will be given an income boost to those who need it without Government mandates.

REDUCING TELEVISION VIOLENCE

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, along with Mr. FEIGHAN and 34 of my colleagues, the Television Violence Act of 1989. This important legislation would allow the television industry to work collectively to curb the violence in programming seen by children without running afoul of the antitrust laws for a period of 3 years. This bill would not impose regulations on networks and broadcasters, but instead would provide the opportunity for them to discuss voluntary guidelines for cutting down on television violence.

Most scientists studying in this field agree that there is a casual relationship between televised violence and later aggressive behavior in children. Constant exposure to graphic violence desensitizes adults and children to the effect of violence in the real world, and introduces an acceptance of violence as a way to resolve our differences. We may be seeing the long-term effects on children when each morning the Washington Post reports the body count of adolescents and young adults gunned down in the street overnight.

By introducing the bill, I am clearly hopeful that the television industry will use this opportunity to address this problem. If not, we will have lost time and some hope, but we would be no worse off than we are today.

OPPOSE DESECRATION OF OUR FLAG

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the American public is understandably outraged that the Chicago Art Institute continues to display an exhibit entitled "What is the Proper Way to Display a U.S. Flag?" The exhibit consists of an American flag placed on the ground in front of a ledger provided for viewers to write their comments. This exhibit encourages individuals to trample on the flag in order to register their views.

While Americans believe in a broad application of the first amendment, cloaking wanton desecration of the flag in the guise of freedom of expression only serves to undermine widespread support for this doctrine. With freedom comes responsibility. The Chicago Art Institute has acted irresponsibly and with flagrant disrespect to our Nation and its most revered symbol.

Today, I am introducing a resolution that condemns the Art Institute for promoting an exhibit that encourages disrespect for the flag and abuses the freedom of speech protected by the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress should tell the Art Institute that by outrageously and irresponsibly abusing the right of free expression, they are damaging the faith in basic human rights that is the foundation of our Constitution.

REINTRODUCTION OF FOREIGN AGENTS COMPULSORY ETHICS IN TRADE ACT

(Mr. WOLPE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, today, Congresswoman KAPTUR and I will be reintroducing our Foreign Agents Compulsory Ethics in Trade Act, the FACE IT bill. Originally introduced in the 99th Congress, we believed then and we believe even more fervently now that swift action must be taken to limit the lobbying activities of former government officials on behalf of foreign governments and corporations.

American taxpayers have a right to expect that those who are negotiating on America's behalf are doing so with American interests foremost, and are not being tempted by the prospect of lucrative postgovernment employment with the foreign interest that sits on the opposite side of the bargaining table.

Yet, high-level Government officials continue to abandon their positions to take jobs as lawyers, lobbyists, and agents for America's stiffest industrial competition—and the damage their migration is doing to America's economic future is immeasurable.

Mr. Speaker, it's time to FACE IT: We must stem the erosion of public confidence in our national institutions, and put the brakes on a revolving door that is spinning out of control. It is our hope that this measure will enjoy broad bipartisan sponsorship and support.

INTERNATIONAL SHOOTING AND HUNTING ALLIANCE [ISHA] ORGANIZED

(Mr. STANGELAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, this Nation has been extremely fortunate that our sportsmen have unselfishly contributed their time and treasure in preserving, protecting, and enhancing the wildlife in America. The abuses of the 19th century through unregulated exploitation of wildlife have given way to professional wildlife management programs, laws and regulations that, in most cases, were proposed, promoted, and supported by sportsmen.

There are many outstanding private organizations of sportsmen that have raised millions of dollars and whose members have devoted untold hours on behalf of wildlife research, habitat protection, reclamation and maintenance, and other activities designed to maintain healthy and stable wildlife populations to be enjoyed by everyone. Other organizations have properly sought to protect the rights of legitimate shooting sports activities and maintain gun safety and hunter education programs.

Recently, a new organization of sportsmen has emerged on the international scene that presently has its base in the Nation's Capital. The International Shooting and Hunting Alliance [ISHA], and its companion organization, the International Shooting and Hunting Alliance Foundation [ISHAF], were created to provide visable and active representation of shooters and hunters in a variety of forums—legislative, regulatory, and legal. For too long sportsmen have been paying more and enjoying less for the wrong reasons.

ISHA believes that much can, and must, be done to insure that reasoned wildlife management and law enforcement prevails and that gun regulation maintains constitutional safeguards for ownership of firearms. Unfortunately, the antishooting and antihunting organizations have injected misinformation, emotion and passion in place of scientific facts and professional guidance when shooting and hunting regulations and laws are considered and adopted. ISHA is pledged to counteract these disruptive and inappropriate political efforts with fact and reasoned policies.

The board of directors of ISHA and ISHAF brings a wealth of talent, education, and experience to the table.

Robert E. Petersen, chairman of the board of Petersen Publishing Co. that, among other publications, publishes Hunting and Guns and Ammo magazines, is the chairman. Mr. Petersen was commissioner of shooting sports for the 1984 Los Angeles Olympics.

Arlen Chaney, president of Omark Industries and chairman of the National Shooting Sports Foundation, is vice chairman.

G. Ray Arnett, former director of California Department of Fish and Game and assistant secretary for fish and wildlife and parks in the previous administration, is secretary-treasurer.

Other members of the board include Bob Allen, founder of Bob Allen Sportswear and member of the Trap Shooting Hall of Fame as well as two time winner of the World All Around Shooting Championship; J.C.D. Bailey, a director of Quail Unlimited, a commissioner of the North Carolina Wildlife Resources Commission and former senior vice president of Ducks Unlimited; Kenneth Brynaert, executive vice president of the Canadian Wildlife Federation; Frank G. Harris III, a life sponsor and national trustee of Ducks Unlimited and a national board member of Waterfowl Habitat Owners Alliance; Dr. Donald T. Lewers, past president of American Wildlife Heritage and the Easton Waterfowl Festival, and Gen. William C. Westmoreland, U.S. Army, retired.

In August 1988, I had the pleasure of addressing a meeting at the Explorers' Club in New York City that ISHA helped to organize. The meeting had representatives from numerous hunting and shooting groups, wildlife and conservation organizations, and the outdoor press. Concern was expressed that far too often the antihunting and antishooting segments of society have gained the ear of legislators and regulators resulting in policies that are not in the best interest of conservation, wildlife management and firearms ownership. I share that concern and support the efforts of ISHA to combat this unsound and dangerous trend.

The record is clear: Sportsmen have directly contributed over $11 billion to improve wildlife conservation and management, instruction for gun safety and hunter education, research and habitat acquisition and maintenance. These funds have been derived from hunting licenses and permits, excise taxes on sporting equipment, Federal and State duck and conservation stamps, and other direct costs to hunters and shooters. In addition, private membership organizations and foundations have contributed millions of dollars and voluntary time to improve and support wildlife conservation and shooting sports. The sportsmen can be justly proud of their contributions in the past, and to insure the sporting heritage for tomorrow, they will not fail to do less in the future through efforts of organizations like the International Shooting and Hunting Alliance. I commend ISHA to my colleagues and wish them success in their laudable goals on behalf of hunting and shooting sports.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES TO FILE REPORT ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 165 AND TO HAVE UNTIL 12 MIDNIGHT, MARCH 15, 1989, TO FILE REPORTS ON HOUSE RESOLUTION 74 AND HOUSE RESOLUTION 76

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services may have until 12 midnight, March 14, 1989, to file a report on House Joint Resolution 165, and to have until 12 midnight, March 15, 1989, to file privileged reports on two resolutions of inquiry, House Resolution 74 and House Resolution 76.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Louisiana). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

THE NEED FOR SUPPLEMENTAL FUNDING FOR THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. BRENNAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, our Government has an obligation to the men and women who served in our military.

One of our most important obligations is to provide health care for sick and deserving veterans.

But for the last few months, that responsibility has been seriously compromised by a funding shortfall within the Veterans' Administration.

The only VA hospital in my State of Maine has been forced to close wards, shut down beds, and turn away veterans whose medical problems are categorized as not sufficiently serious. Veterans who have talked to me feel hurt and betrayed.

Similar cutbacks are happening across the country.

I am introducing legislation that would provide emergency supplemental funding to the VA budget for veterans' medical care. This legislation could help to reopen wards that have been closed, resume treatment to veterans who have been denied care, and begin to restore the integrity of our Nation's commitment to our veterans.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to be remiss in our duty to our veterans, for they were not remiss in their duty to us. They deserve the best medical care we can provide. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this supplemental appropriation for veterans' hospitals across the country.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE DEATH OF THE LATE HONORABLE JIM O'HARA

(Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that Jim O'Hara, a former Member of this body and the Michigan delegation, and a dear friend of mine and many others, died yesterday.

James Grant O'Hara was born in Washington, DC, on November 8, 1925, and moved to Michigan with his parents in 1939. He graduated from the University of Detroit High School in 1943 and from there, he entered the U.S. Army where he fought for this country in the Pacific theater. Following the war, Jim attended the University of Michigan. He graduated in 1954 from the undergraduate school and from the University of Michigan Law School in 1955. Jim was admitted to the bar in 1955 and practiced law in Detroit and Macomb County, MI. Elected to Congress in 1959, he faithfully represented the people of the 12th District, just north of Detroit, for 16 years until 1977. While in Congress he served as chairman of the Democratic Study Group and was chairman of the Commission on Rules for the Democratic National Committee from 1969 to 1972. In 1976, he made an unsuccessful bid for a nomination to the U.S. Senate. Upon retiring from the House of Representatives, Jim resumed his practice of law in Washington, DC, and soon thereafter he chaired the Federal Minimum Wage Study Commission from 1978 to 1981.

Mr. Speaker, we are deeply saddened by the loss of this great man. He will always be remembered by his colleagues, and, on behalf of my colleagues in the Michigan congressional delegation, I extend the condolences of myself and his friends here in the House to his dear wife, Susan, who was his faithful helpmate and friend for so many years, and for the fine family which he raised during a long, productive, and honorable life.

Mr. Speaker, the Nation is poorer for the loss of Jim O'Hara.

LEGISLATION TO PROHIBIT FORMER FEDERAL OFFICIALS FROM LOBBYING ON BEHALF OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS AND CORPORATIONS

Mr. BILBRAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILBRAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call attention to a problem that is threatening the economic security of the United States. Over the past decade, there has been an alarming increase in the number of U.S. trade negotiators who have left Government service to lobby on behalf of foreign governments and corporations. Perhaps the best example of this can be seen at the Federal Trade Commission, where every general counsel since 1973 has left for a position lobbying on behalf of our competitors. This type of conduct has happened so often that I could not hope to list even a fraction of the examples during my alloted 1 minute.

My distinguished colleagues, HOWARD WOLPE, MARCY KAPTUR, and JOHN BRYANT, have boldly taken the legislative initiative in this area. Today, we will introduce legislation that will prohibit former high ranking Federal officials, including Members of Congress, who were privy to sensitive trade and national security data, from lobbying on behalf of foreign governments and corporations for a period of 4 years after their government service ceases.

This bill will assure the public that our trade negotiators are putting America first, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

LEGISLATION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION REGARDING ILLEGAL ALIENS

(Mr. VALENTINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing with 20 colleagues legislation that would correct what I believe is an ill-conceived and unjust policy of the U.S. Census Bureau.

From all indications, the U.S. Census Bureau intends to continue its policy of counting illegal aliens for reapportionment purposes when the decennial census is taken in 1990. The direct result of this policy will be that some States will lose seats in the House of Representatives and other States will gain seats because of the hundreds of thousands, or perhaps millions, of illegal aliens currently residing in this country.

I do not believe that individuals who have entered the United States by breaking the laws of this country should be represented in Congress. Neither do I believe that the framers of the U.S. Constitution intended to provide for representation in the national legislature of illegal aliens.

In effect, what this policy does is ensure that U.S. citizens are not represented equitably.

Although legislation was introduced in the 100th Congress that sought to correct this situation, it is my view that only by amending the Constitution will the interests of our citizens be assured and protected.

My bill will amend the Constitution to read:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State who are citizens of the United States or lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States.

I urge your support for this measure.

FORT MEADE, MD

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I visited Fort Meade to view the 9,000 acres of that military installation should the proposed base closings be approved by this body either by a vote or by default. Fort Meade is in Congressman MCMILLEN's district and I understand Mr. MCMILLEN is as upset about this as I am.

What a waste of Government property if this is sold off to pay for the costs of the other base closing.

The military stationed there will be confined to another section. Granted it appears there is enough acreage for the immediate operations of the Army there. However, that 9,000 acres fit in between the National Security Agency—the NSA, the secret operation of the Defense Department, on one side—and on the other is the Patuxent Wildlife Refuge where these experts have saved the whooping cranes and other important rare fowl.

On the 9,000 acres is located an excellent airport facility where the military trains helicopter and small plane crews.

The only approved landfill for the base is within the 9,000 acres. And, of course, there are wetlands and the Little Patuxent River running through the property.

On considerable acreage, it is anticipated that there are thousands of unexploded shells dating back as far as World War I.

The savings for the base closing is said to be $5 billion over 20 years, much less than originally predicted.

I wonder how much it is going to cost to clean up those unexploded devices on installations like Fort Meade so we can save the $250 million a year.

Probably much more than the $250 million while we are going to surround the National Security Agency with unwanted development and adversely affect a nearby wildlife refuge at Fort Meade. What others are being affected in the same way?

PASS SUDAN RELIEF RESOLUTION

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, two basic facts about the famine in Sudan cry out for our immediate attention. First, the international community must move emergency food stocks to the right distribution points in Sudan in the next months or hundreds of thousands of people—perhaps a half million—could die from starvation and ill health. Second, unless the United States and other interested governments help to mediate a peaceful settlement to the Sudanese civil war, even food aid will not prevent a catastrophic loss of life among the civilian population.

In a word, we must act and we must act now.

To that end, I urge my colleagues to pass Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, a resolution that addresses the acute humanitarian crisis affecting the people of the Sudan.

We must respond now to the plight of many thousands of Sudanese civilians who are suffering an unimaginable horror as a result of the political dissent and civil war which divides their country. Hundreds of thousands of Sudanese face an imminent peril of starvation—a fate which has already claimed the lives of great numbers of Sudanese people. This resolution directs our Government to appoint a special envoy to help mediate peace and to use all available resources to avert further famine.

As many as 1 million Sudanese already have starved to death since the struggle began in 1983. A toll in 1988 alone exceeded a quarter of a million people. This is a remarkable statistic: 250,000 or more noncombatants died last year in the southern regions of the Sudan from starvation or from the infectious diseases which preyed upon the malnourished victims of the warfare. A large percentage of those who died were children. In several displaced persons camps in the Sudan, there are no children under age 3 present—the infants and young children have all died from starvation or epidemic.

AN END TO INACTION

It is imperative that there be no doubt concerning the policies of the United States Government in regards to the horrible famine stalking the Sudan. We cannot accept the use of food as political weapon by any party. We cannot remain silent when innocent children are dying as a result of conflict not of their making or comprehension. We cannot accept the notion that some people are beyond reach or that the situation is too complicated. We must redouble efforts to honor longstanding American humanitarian traditions which require that no options are overlooked, no avenues left unexplored, as we strive to guarantee that no more of these children starve to death.

This resolution emphatically underscores the right course for our policy: Fulfilling America's traditional role as the world's leader in feeding the hungry. I am pleased to have worked with Messrs. ACKERMAN, WOLPE, SOLOMON, and others in bringing this resolution to the floor.

I urge my colleagues to lend their unanimous support to this bipartisan initiative.

PRESIDENT BUSH OUGHT TO SHOW LEADERSHIP ON GUN CONTROL

(Mr. FEIGHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for one minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, President Bush ought to start acting like a leader on the issue of gun control.

Then Patrick Purdy sprayed a California playground with his AK-47 last January, George Bush talked about the right of every hunter in America to own his own assault weapon.

A month later, Time magazine graphically detailed America's gun epidemic. It showed how purchases of AK-47's have skyrocketed from 4,000 a year in 1986 to 40,000 in 1988. And Time posed a question for President Bush: "If the U.S. cannot make progress in the wake of the Stockton massacre," it asked, "When can it?"

Barbara Bush had the right answer: She called for an immediate ban. Her husband repeated the NRA's position paper.

Now even the President's handpicked Drug Czar calls for action against assault weapons. George Bush continues to waffle, drawing a line between automatic and semiautomatic assault weapons.

There is no real difference Mr. President. All assault weapons are designed for one purpose—killing people.

Mr. Speaker, George Bush continues to say that "we'll see"—and promises to "take a hard look" at this problem.

Mr. Speaker, America needs more than a hard look from the President. It's time for the President to do something to keep these guns off our streets. It's time for the President to show some leadership.

IT IS TIME TO FACE IT

(Ms. KAPTUR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, today, I, along with my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] am reintroducing a bill called FACE IT, the Foreign Agents Compulsory Ethics in Trade Act. I commend the administration's Ethics Commission for the many solid recommendations it made in its report released last Friday, but I find the recommendation relating to foreign interest representation before this Government insufficient.

The Commission recommends a 2-year ban on disclosing classified information or nonpublic information regarding the Government's position or strategy in important trade negotiations. Although a worthy goal, violations of this provision would be difficult to define and even harder to enforce.

For in fact, how can we identify with certainty the source of divulged information when many people have access to it.

Our bill, FACE IT, first introduced in 1985, goes a necessary step further and bans former Government officials from representing, aiding, or advising a foreign interest on a matter before the U.S. Government for a period of 4 years after leaving Government service. It seeks to deny foreign interests the manipulative advantage in U.S. trade policy considerations they now enjoy. It simultaneously insures the integrity of representation in ongoing trade negotiations with other nations. It is time to FACE IT by restoring integrity to public service.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BILBRAY). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken after debate has been concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF SMITH-LEVER ACT

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 124) to recognize the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act of May 8, 1914, and its role in establishing our Nation's system of State Cooperative Extension Services.

H.J. RES. 124

Whereas the Act of May 8, 1914, (38 Stat. 372) as amended, commonly known as the Smith-Lever Act of 1914, has fostered through the United States Department of Agriculture the development of a system of State Cooperative Extension Services in conjunction with our Nation's land-grant colleges and universities which disseminates and encourages the application of research-generated knowledge and leadership techniques to individuals, families and communities:

Whereas the Smith-Lever Act of 1914 has contributed greatly in assisting American farm families with the efficient production of a reliable supply of food and fiber for consumers in this country and worldwide;

Whereas the Cooperative Extension System has done much to help rural and urban adults and youth help themselves as they have steadily improved their quality of life and leadership ability; and

Whereas the relationship existing between the Federal, State and county extension services has provided for citizen input to research and educational programs of USDA and the land-grant universities for three quarters of a century: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the sense of the Congress that the Cooperative Extension System should continue to be supported as an important investment of the Nation's future, and that the seventy-fifth anniversary of the enactment of the Smith-Lever Act of 1914 should be commemorated on May 8, 1989.

SEC. 2. The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation commemorating the enactment of the Smith-Lever Act of May 1914, and its role in establishing our Nation's Cooperative Extension System.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MORRISON] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TRAXLER], the original author of this joint resolution.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding this time to me.

I wish to extend my personal thanks to him and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADIGAN], the ranking member on the Agriculture Committee and express my appreciation for the prompt circumstance of moving this so quickly. The gentleman is a cosponsor of the resolution and is a person who has long been involved in Cooperative Extension and it would not be possible to bring this to the floor today without his support, both for the resolution and for Cooperative Extension.

Mr. Speaker, Cooperative Extension is a blend of what is best for our Nation. It represents a cooperative effort of Federal, State, and local governments in its design and funding. It makes heavy utilization in many of its programs of volunteers who participate solely because they believe in the quality of Extension programs.

Many around the world marvel at the amazing information dissemination machine called the Cooperative Extension Service. They recognize that the quality research done by our land grant institutions would not make the substantial impact that it has made on our food and fiber producing capabilities if it had not been for the transfer of laboratory gains to implemented production gains as provided by Cooperative Extension.

Many farmers have been helped through the Extension Management Assistance teams who have done their very best to assist farmers in developing revised financial projections for their farms.

I know there are many of us who can trace some of our fondest memories back to the days when we participated in extension programs as part of the 4-H Program. This program helps guide formative young minds toward leadership capabilities, toward an acceptance of responsibility, and most importantly toward a hunger for new and intense challenges. While it has traditionally been viewed as a rural youth program, we would not be doing the program justice unless we all remembered that 4-H has an extremely strong presence in urban areas.

I might add that the Expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program offered by Extension has made a difference for millions of low-income Americans. This program has used a very effective in-home approach to helping people learn how to get more and better food for their dollar. It has also helped many people develop a heightened sense of self-worth. It has gone a long way forward to developing whole new careers.

Extension has truly provided excellence from a number of other programs, like urban gardening, pesticide impact assessment, and so forth. It is expanding its efforts in rural development and recognizing that as America changes, so must rural America and Cooperative Extension.

Mr. Speaker, Extension has faced many challenges in the past. I must admit, though, that I am very concerned about the ability of Extension to meet the challenges of our budgetary constraints. These are difficult budgetary times, but this is an agency that deserves all of our support.

I am concerned that this excellent program has been taken for granted by too many who simply believe that it will continue as it always has. No one ought to make that assumption. Therefore, this resolution celebrating the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act should, in my opinion, serve as a rallying point for those of us who firmly believe in Cooperative Extension programs. It is only with the continued dedication of people who recognize excellence when they find it that programs like Extension will survive the difficult budgetary decisions that must be made over the next several years.

Mr. Speaker, I wish again to extend my sincere congratulations to the millions of people who have been involved in this Cooperative Extension over these past 75 years, to the volunteers and participants, such as myself, and to the committee which has original jurisdiction over this, the Agriculture Committee, for the fine appreciation they have shown toward this agency. Without the help of the distinguished chairman and the minority member we probably would not be on the floor today celebrating this happy occasion.

So I urge all my colleagues to join with me in extending a very happy 75th birthday to Cooperative Extension.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, we celebrate today the 75th anniversary of what I consider one of America's great success stories. the combination of our land grant colleges and universities doing basic agricultural research and the State Cooperative Extension Service as created 75 years ago in the Smith-Lever Act.

The success of this, of course, is well known to us and that is that America is a very well-fed Nation and for the lowest cost of virtually anywhere in the world, plus we have in our productive capacity the ability to feed a major percentage of the rest of the world.

So it is appropriate that we pause today with the passage of House Joint Resolution 124 and pay tribute to this 75-year success story. It is a story that includes cooperation among government at all levels, Federal, State, and local, and some marvelous people who take the agricultural story out to the farms and make sure that it is effectively applied there, and the number of volunteers who work with organizations associated with the Cooperative Extension Service, so our congratulations, and I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, our consideration of House Joint Resolution 124 provides a valuable opportunity to discuss and commemorate the importance of the Smith-Lever Act. On May 8, 1914, President Woodrow Wilson signed into law broadly drawn legislation that made possible a permanent nationwide system of extension work in agriculture and home economics, including both the demonstration and county agency system as developed by agricultural colleges.

The Cooperative Extension Service has aged well and the people of that institution have, without interruption, served admirably the interests of agriculture and rural America. The Secretary of Agriculture, Henry C. Wallace, in August 1922, made a formal statement as to the role of County Extension agents:

> These extension workers are public teachers paid with money largely raised from all of the people by taxation and are charged with giving instruction and practical demonstration in agriculture and home economics. Their work covers the entire rural field, which includes economic production, economic marketing, and the development of better home, community, and social conditions.

Although the issues change over time, we in rural America are well served by the stability of purpose that characterizes the Cooperative Extension Service.

In 1989, the Extension Service represents a critical link between the development of agricultural technology and its application by the producing community. Currently, our producers are looking to the Extension Service for help in addressing environmental issues linked to ground water quality and proper pesticide use. Despite the rapidity by which these issues change, I am confident that the quality of service of our Nation's farmers will remain high.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this important resolution.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on behalf of House Joint Resolution 124 to commemorate the 75th anniversary of enactment of the Smith-Lever Act and its role in establishing our Nation's system of State Cooperative Extension Services.

When President Woodrow Wilson signed the Smith-Lever Act into law on May 8, 1914, the Extension Service legally became the educational agency of the U.S. Department of Agriculture [USDA]. Its mission, as mandated by the legislation, is "to aid in diffusion among the people of the United States useful and practical information. * * * [E]xtension work shall consist of the development of practical applications of research knowledge and giving of instruction and practical demonstrations of existing or improved practices or technologies."

Actually, the Department of Agriculture has been engaged in extension work prior to enactment of the Smith-Lever Act. As early as 1898, a USDA employee named Seaman A. Knapp was demonstrating the results of agricultural research on rice production to Louisiana farmers. By 1904 he was joined by two dozen other agents in Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas. Two years later Knapp's dream of network of USDA agents in each county of the country got underway.

Originally focused on disseminating and encouraging the application of useful and practical information relating to agriculture and home economics, today's Cooperative Extension system has adapted and changed to better serve modern American society. While many of us associate Extension activities with only agriculture, actually two-thirds of Extensions' clientele now live in metropolitan areas.

Today's Extension system includes professionals at each of our land-grant universities—all 50 States, Puerto Rico, and U.S. Virgin Islands, Guam, the Northern Mariana Islands, American Samoa, the Federated States of Micronesia, and right here in the District of Columbia. Extension employees are in nearly all of the Nation's counties.

In 1986, the Extension system refocused its educational efforts and established eight national priority initiatives. These initiatives are: Alternative agricultural opportunities; building human capital; competitiveness and profitability of American agriculture; conservation and management of natural resources; family and economic well-being; improving nutrition; diet, and health; revitalizing rural America; and water quality.

Recently, the disturbing statistics and trends involving poverty, poor nutrition, pregnancy, substance abuse, depression, the suicide among our teenagers led to the announcement of a ninth initiative—"Youth at Risk."

Mr. Speaker, for 75 years the Cooperative Extension system has identified and sought to solve, through practical research-based knowledge, many of the critical concerns of American families and American agriculture. It has served us well. The productivity of the American farmer is testimony of that. The fact that, out of all nations, American consumers spent the least percentage of their disposable income on food is testimony to that. The knowledge Americans have about nutrition and food safety is testimony to that.

Today's Extension system is preparing itself to meet the challenges of the 21st century. Its overall mission will be even more important in the years ahead—to link modern research, science, and technology to the needs of people in ways that help us in our daily lives and in improving the lives of our children.

Mr. Speaker, I hope my colleagues and the 22 million households who have at one time or another made use of Extension services will join me in commemorating the enactment of the Smith-Lever Act and in paying tribute to the men and women who work in today's Cooperative Extension system.

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my strong support for House Joint Resolution 124, a joint resolution to recognize the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act and its role in establishing the system of State Cooperative Extension Services.

The Extension Program has long been recognized as truly outstanding. It has played a major role in helping to develop the most productive agriculture system in the world, it has encouraged our youth to take an active interest in learning through 4–H, and has improved our rural communities and urban areas as new problems confronted the Nation. Its philosophy of enhancing human progress through the products of research has worked and has effectively taken knowledge directly to the people of rural America for 75 years.

Clearly, the key to the success of the Extension Program has come because of its unique structure as a partnership of Federal, State, and county governments with strong guidance in its priorities from those it serves. Thousands of local volunteers and extension professionals in more than 3,000 offices nationwide contribute time and skills to help with adult and youth programs.

The future of American relys largely on how well people are prepared to face critical issues, and the education Extension provides can help us achieve that goal. Its focus on improving our health and nutrition; providing ideas for new and competitive agriculture; revitalizing rural America and the quality of water we drink; and conserving and managing our national resources will effectively lead us into the 21st century.

Again, I urge my colleagues to support House Joint Resolution 124 to celebrate the years of valuable assistance the Cooperative Extension Service has given us.

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, I think everyone in this House recognizes the importance of the Smith-Lever Act and the profound impact our State Cooperative Extension Service has had on this Nation. I also know both of you understand how much Extension has meant to our home State of Texas.

But, I would like to enter in to the RECORD some information about the work the Texas Agricultural Extension Service is doing today. Extension has been extremely important to the 13th District of Texas. It is no small coincidence that the Extension Service has been aggressive and active in this, one of the most productive agriculture regions in the country.

By making this information about Extension services available for all to see, we are paying tribute to the countless men and women who over the last 75 years have helped build Extension into what it is today.

Texas, as well as the other states, also joins with the U.S. Department of Agriculture to form a nationwide cooperative Extension network.

Those things start with food and fiber products, but also include economies, businesses and communities, families, youth and leaders.

Today's agriculture is based on productivity and profitability—a $33 billion per year economic impact on Texas and the source of one out of every five jobs.

When Texans speak, the Texas Agricultural Extension Service listens—and then acts to help people to help themselves. Extension has the unique organizational framework and outreach capabilities to provide programs that can help rural and urban citizens of all ages and backgrounds to utilize available resources to help meet their individual and community needs.

This unique system of informal education was made possible by passage of the Federal Smith-Lever Act in 1914. The following year, the Texas Legislature accepted the terms of the Act and established the Texas Agricultural Extension Service as a legal entity in the state, assigning it to The Texas A&M University System for administration. State legislation also authorizes financial participation by County Commissioners Courts in this cooperative effort. Thus, the Extension Service is a partnership of the federal government through the United States Department of Agriculture, the state government through the designated state land grant university and the county government through the Commissioners Court in each county. Nationally, this system is known as the Cooperative Extension System.

The basic function of the Texas Agricultural Extension Service as stated in the Smith-Lever Act is ". . . to aid in diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics, and to encourage the application of the same. . . ."

For more than 70 years, Texans have relied on Extension for the most current, reliable information to solve everyday problems of living. County Extension agents, who live and work with people in a designated county, form the basic unit of the Texas Agricultural Extension Service. Extension professional educators possess broad training in agriculture, home economics or a related area. They conduct educational programs to help people use scientific information to solve practical problems and utilize available resources.

County Extension agents are supported by a staff of specialists trained in subjects for which Extension has educational responsibility. Specialists are located at Texas A&M University and at the 14 district headquarters throughout the state where they can respond quickly to clientele needs. Specialists form an effective link between the county Extension agents and the research and teaching staffs of The Texas A&M University System. This organizational framework allows scientific information developed by the Texas Agricultural Experiment Station, the Texas Agricultural Extension Service, USDA and other public and private research organizations to be interpreted so that people can make better decisions and reach economic and other goals which they set for themselves. It also makes resources of the Texas Agricultural Extension Service and other parts of The Texas A&M University System available to citizens across the state.

Educational efforts of the Extension Service are expanded by thousands of Texans who volunteer to serve as leaders in adult and youth programs. Programs are designed to meet the needs of people in each county, with direct input from citizens of each county.

Representative residents in each county of the state work with Extension agents in volunteer groups called Extension Program Councils. These councils help develop immediate and long-range plans for local Extension programs and activities aimed at dealing with the most critical issues.

Long-range plans from the counties are incorporated by the Extension Service into a statewide plan that determines overall priorities and resource allocation. In this way, educational programs are produced in response to local needs as defined by local leaders.

This grassroots process of program determination is the driving force of the Extension Service. That's what makes the Texas Agricultural Extension Service unique among educational institutions—helping people to help themselves and others through educational opportunities offered throughout Texas.

The Texas Agricultural Extension Service has programs for all Texans. In fact, more than 12,300 Texans worked together in their counties during 1986 to determine the issues that are critical to the counties and to identify those that Extension programs should address during the rest of the decade.

Rapid changes in the state's economy and population have placed difficult demands on the resources of Texas farmers, ranchers, families, businesses, governments and organizations. Extension staff members began new initiatives early in 1986 to deal with the changing times. Concerned citizens and leaders in each county were invited to tell Extension staff which issues they believed should be dealt with during the next several years. Business people, homemakers, farmers, ranchers, retirees, clergy, teachers, elected officials and others from many walks of life responded to Extension's invitation to serve on citizen task forces. They helped conduct a series of county meetings to analyze local problems and to set both short-term and long-term objectives for solving those problems.

Almost 5,000 diverse issues were identified, but similarities found in many county issues emerged, resulting in 12 broad issues determined to be critical. Extension will give statewide emphasis to educational programs that address these issues.

The insight of the citizen task forces has enabled Extension staff and volunteers to develop new educational programs and to redirect former programs to best meet today's needs. These efforts have been mapped into a new long-range Extension program guide in each county. The collective results from the task forces contributed to a state plan of action for the Texas Agricultural Extension Service to address the 12 issues that emerged as being most critical. This kind of citizen involvement has helped to mobilize Extension resources to effectively respond to local needs.

The statewide issues include:

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION

Texas producers are increasing profitability through Extension programs that help them to:

Assess market potential and identify marketing channels for diversifying agricultural commodities and enterprises

Determine adaptivity and feasibility of alternative agricultural operations

Understand and adopt emerging technologies which encourage diversification that permits market or production advantages

Use management and technical skills to diversify operations

Analyze operations and identify potential areas for diversification

AGRICULTURAL PROFITABILITY AND COMPETITIVENESS

Multidisciplinary Extension teams are teaching producers to use a total production systems approach that helps them to:

Evaluate the quantity and quality of available resources

Implement production technology after careful consideration of effects on total farm or ranch profit

Determine the profit-maximizing combinations of available resources and of input use

Develop and use basic financial management tools, evaluate and monitor marketing strategies and implement risk-reducing measures

Base capital asset purchases on return on investment and cash flow feasibility

Negotiate equitable rental arrangements

Structure the farm or ranch business to take advantage of income and estate tax laws

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Community leaders are learning to understand their local economy, develop necessary leadership skills and implement strategies for economic growth and business vitality through Extension programs. These programs, which are targeted to the tourism, business and industrial sectors of the rural economy, as well as the agribusiness and service industries focus on:

Analyzing demographic and economic data to enable county and community leaders to understand their local economy

Helping local leaders to analyze their needs and potentials as a basis for identifying feasible development opportunities and setting priorities

Training leaders in strategies for economic growth and concepts and procedures for planning, establishing and facilitating development efforts

Teaching business management skills and practices to help small business owners/operators improve survival and profitability

FINANCIAL PLANNING AND MANAGEMENT

As the financial and consumer marketplace expands and consumer choices become more complex, Texans are receiving information and learning skills through Extensions programs to help them make decisions which:

Strengthen financial management practices and increase potential for achieving financial goals

Utilize computer and video technology, individualized Instruction, worksite education and other educational Innovations

Provide training for leaders and volunteers in financial management topics

Develop cooperative linkages with public and private groups interested in the economic security of Texans

IMPROVING NUTRITION, DIET AND HEALTH

Research data on nutrition and health serve as the framework for Extension programs which:

Increase awareness of personal risk factors and their relationship to disease and disability

Help individuals to identify specific risk factors through appraisal instruments, dietary analysis and screening tests

Foster positive lifestyle changes in weight control, exercise and fitness, nutrition for special diets, personal safety and responsible use of alcohol and drugs

Establish communication among producer groups, governmental and voluntary organizations, educators, researchers and policymakers to facilitate unified health and nutrition information

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT

Extension is helping Texans develop effective leadership skills to deal with change and pressure by:

Implementing strategies for identifying, recruiting and fostering involvement of potential leaders in community service

Conducting educational programs to strengthen leaders' knowledge and skills

Preparing emerging leaders to study and develop solutions to issues affecting their individual, family and community well-being

Involving citizens in leadership and decisionmaking roles which direct efforts to resolve local issues through education or group action

MARKETING OF AGRICULTURAL AND NATURAL RESOURCE PRODUCTS

Extension programs will help Texas agricultural and natural resource producers enhance their $10 billion market through:

Concentrated media efforts

Development of computerized decision aids

Timely dissemination of market information

Cooperation with other agencies and commodity groups in domestic and foreign market development

Programs on group marketing alternatives

Identification and evaluation of potential for additional processing procedures and value-added products

REVITALIZATION OF RURAL TEXAS

Rural Texans are achieving revitalization through Extension programs that help them plan for, fund and provide public goods and services. Programs focus on:

Organizational development

Leadership, management and planning skills

Impact analysis

Cost analysis

STRENGTHENING TEXAS FAMILIES

Texans are being helped to strengthen their families through Extension programs that:

Promote family interaction and support family functioning at various life cycle stages

Develop family strengths

Provide research-based information for professionals

Train volunteers in family support programming

Provide information on policy development and implications for families

RURAL-URBAN RELATIONSHIPS

To help rural and urban citizens become more knowledgeable about issues and make informed decisions, Extension programs provide information on:

Land utilization

Water resources

Environmental quality

Role and needs of agriculture in Texas

Consumers as beneficiaries of research and education

WATER QUALITY AND CONSERVATION

To assure Texas citizens as adequate, safe water supply to support continued development of economic, natural and human resources and protection of the environment, Extension programs will focus on:

Improved on-farm technologies for conservation

Brush, weed and water pollution control

Home and landscape water use reduction

Water policies, issues and programs

Beneficial use of agricultural wastes, municipal effluents and sludges

YOUTH DEVELOPMENT

Extension is collaborating with other youth-serving agencies to conduct effective action programs that:

Identify as recruit qualified volunteers to work with youths

Promote parent-child communications and interaction

Provide opportunities for youths to practice developmental skills in a positive, supportive atmosphere

Help youths to become proficient in scientific and technical subject matter skills and leadership skills through participation in 4-H projects.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join with a number of my colleagues in commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act, which established the Cooperative Extension Service. My State of South Dakota is one of the most agricultural states in this Nation, and the benefits that have been derived from the many programs carried out by the Extension Service are numerous. Many of this Nation's leaders were once members of 4-H clubs and the 4-H of today, although it has changed tremendously is still challenging our youth to make the best better.

The Extension Service, as well as the 4-H program, have played extremely important roles over the past few years as we have seen this Nation's rural society stressed to the breaking point. The Extension Service and 4-H have expanded their outreach to include helping people deal with many of the financial and social issues facing them. The rural crisis of the eighties provided an opportunity to furnish financial management advice, sessions on coping with stress and other programs beyond the normal services we have come to depend on. The Extension Service has kept pace with the need for up-to-date information on topics of current interest.

The response shown during the recent difficult times in the rural economy was only part of the expansion we have seen in the scope of extension programs. While the county offices continue to be a valuable source of information on topics ranging from safe handling of pesticides to custom farming rates; the scope of issues addressed by the Extension Service has expanded greatly. Farmers as well as city dwellers have come to rely on their local or county office for timely and helpful information. County Extension agents continue to be on the leading edge in educating producers about alternative and new methods of farming, and seminars on healthy diets and exercise are also becoming familiar events.

As the needs and interests of young people have changed 4-H has also changed. Involvement with schools, both urban and rural, on issues such as "children at risk" and latchkey kids is demonstrating that 4-H can and does have a positive effect in preparing our young people to deal with all aspects of life. The range of interest areas available for 4-H'ers to explore has also grown tremendously over the past 75 years. The young person who may be showing cattle at the fair one day, is proudly accepting a blue ribbon on his or her computer science project the next.

I am confident that the Extension Service will continue to grow and expand the range of assistance they provide as the needs of Americans change. Mr. Speaker, I cannot fail to mention that a great deal of the leadership and hard work involved in the success of the Extension Service is due to the many, many volunteers who have given of their time since its inception. In passing this resolution, we are also recognizing the work of the fine individuals who have served as members of their county Extension councils or 4-H leaders.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 124, to recognize the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act and its role in establishing the system of State Cooperative Extension Services. Since the act was passed in 1914, the Extension Service has provided an invaluable service to the people of rural America.

As a member who has represented perhaps the most rural district in the country for the past 8 years, I have had the opportunity to work closely with the Minnesota Extension Service. During the farm depression of the early eighties, it was the Extension Service which assisted farm families in making tough farm management decisions: decisions that set the course for their families' future. For some, those decisions meant leaving the farm and starting a new way of life. For others, it meant having to deal with family stress that was caused by financial hardships. In all of these cases, the Extension Service stepped in to provide counseling services through project support: a program which provided families with the background and facts needed to make those family decisions.

Other changes in rural America have continued to alter the fabric of our basic social unit: the American family. The country's future leaders, its youth, are particularly important. Extension has responded to this challenge by adapting 4-H programs to meet the needs of today's youth. These programs which encourage young people to develop the necessary skills and talents to become the community leaders of tomorrow. It will be those community leaders, with the assistance of the Extension Service, that will be charged with revitalizing rural America. The diversity among rural communities has made this task of designing a national rural revitalization policy more difficult. But programs such as Minnesota's Project Future has taken the lead in this effort. By operating at the local level and collaborating with State and local governments, individuals, and other research and educational institutions, Project Future will help rebuild rural Minnesota: community by community.

Mr. Speaker, while we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act, I also want to take this opportunity to point out that the Minnesota Extension Service will be celebrating its 80th birthday this year. Minnesota's Extension program actually predates the Smith-Lever Act by 5 years, making it a national leader even 80 years ago.

Pat Borich, the dean and director of the Minnesota Extension Service has said that the "measure of an organization is the excellence of its product and the effects of the product on its clientele." If this is the yardstick by which we measure the success of an organization, we can say with confidence that Extension has achieved remarkable success over that last 75 years. We wish them another 75 years of success in helping our rural communities meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, today we are here to recognize the 75th anniversary of the Smith-Lever Act of 1914, and to honor its role in establishing our Nation's system of State cooperative extension services.

In my own district, in Middletown, NY, is located one such extension service. This cooperative named the Cornell Cooperative Extension is one of the many cooperative extensions located around our Nation specifically setup to analyze, inform, and to lend a helping hand to our Nation's farmers.

The Cornell Cooperative Extension throughout its tenure has allowed those farmers located in our Hudson Valley to continue their livelihood in a successful manner. In a region where drought, floods, wind, hail, and other physical disasters have threatened the livelihood of the vegetable grower and dairy farmer, Cornell Cooperative has time and again proven itself a valuable institution dedicated to helping the farmers of the Hudson Valley.

I am therefore pleased to offer my support for House Joint Resolution 124 and wish to thank the good people at Cornell Cooperative Extension as well as those located throughout our Nation for their outstanding exuberant efforts.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BILBRAY). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] that the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 124).

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILDFIRE SUPPRESSION ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 829) to make permanent the authority provided under the Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 829

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Wildfire Suppression Assistance Act".

SEC. 2. PERMANENT AUTHORITY.

The Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act (Public Law 100-428) is amended by repealing section 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MORRISON] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does exactly what the title says. I urge the Members to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the chairman of the subcommittee which has jurisdiction over this matter, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER], who has done extensive work in this area and should be commended for his interest and devotion to the forest system and everything related to its operation.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, the measure pending before us today, H.R. 829, is essentially the same as the final version of a bill I sponsored last year which was considered and approved by the Agriculture Committee and passed the House in the waning days of the session but which was not considered in the Senate.

Working with the Forest Service and the Department of Agriculture last year, we drafted legislation to authorize the use, under certain conditions, of funds available for firefighting on Federal lands to reimburse foreign organizations for assistance in suppressing wildfires. In particular, the Forest Service sought the authority in order to enlist the use of specialized aircraft from Canada to battle expected fires in the drought-stricken Western United States.

We hope to have this authority to the Agriculture and Interior Departments by the middle of summer last year, but the legislation was bogged down for a while. As the severity of the fires increased, members of our committee, with the leadership of Chairman DE LA GARZA, worked with others in the House and Senate and the administration and developed a measure, patterned after H.R. 4936, to provide this important authority on a temporary basis. This bill was enacted into law and Canadian assistance was utilized in fighting the wildfires in the Yellowstone region and elsewhere in the West. The authorities provided in that act expired on December 31, 1988.

H.R. 829 would simply make permanent the authorities provided under the Temporary Act. This bill would not alter the provision of the act which ensures that domestic firefighting resources and personnel are used to supress fires whenever possible.

I appreciate the assistance of the other interested committees in expediting consideration of this bill so that the agencies which must prepare for this year's fire season will know early on whether they can count on this additional authority.

H.R. 829 was endorsed by the administration in testimony before our subcommittee, I know of no opposition, and I urge the House to approve the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to again thank the chairman of the full committee for expediting this measure from the Committee on Agriculture and his work in this regard and also wish to thank my ranking minority member, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MORRISON], for his assistance in bringing this matter to the floor in an expeditious manner.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of H.R. 829, I am delighted to have this important legislation before the House today.

This bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior to enter into reciprocal agreements with Canada and other foreign fire organizations for mutual aid in wildfire protection and suppression. Identical authority was provided by Congress last year, on a temporary basis, in response to the extreme wildfire situation in the Greater Yellowstone Area and other parts of the Western United States, including the Wenatchee and Okanogan National Forest in Washington State. The ability to utilize highly trained personnel and specialized equipment from Canada—together with a turn in the weather—was instrumental in dousing those fires.

H.R. 829, by simply removing the December 31, 1988, termination date contained in the Temporary Wildfire Suppression Act, would make this important authority permanent. I should also point out that the administration strongly endorses this legislation because of the recurring need for assistance from our neighbors to the north.

Because the need for assistance from foreign firefighting organizations is likely to vary widely from year to year, depending on weather and forest conditions, the Congressional Budget Office cannot accurately estimate the potential costs or savings that could result from these agreements. CBO points out that the assistance could result in net savings if fires are extinguished more quickly or if reconstruction and cleanup costs are reduced.

Under the bill, assistance would be enlisted only if the head of the respective agency determined that U.S. firefighting resources could not by themselves suppress the fire in a timely fashion. By making the reciprocal arrangement permanent, we can save time and that means fewer losses. I urge my colleagues to approve H.R. 829 so that this authority can be restored before the 1989 summer fire season begins.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO], who has been of invaluable assistance in this endeavor and with whom we enjoy working in areas of mutual concern, including suppression of fire in our forest system.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 829, the Wildlife Suppression Assistance Act. I am a cosponsor of this bill that facilitates U.S. cooperation on a permanent basis for agreements with foreign nations and firefighters, particularly from Canada, in times of fire emergencies in any nation. With the passage of this bill, the United States will be able to reimburse other countries for their help. For years, Canada has covered the wages and expenses of our firefighters when they have fought fires in Canada and now we will be able to reciprocate when Canadians come here to lend us a hand. Two severe fire seasons in a row, in 1987 and 1988, have taught us just how important this foreign assistance is. During both of these fire seasons, our own firefighting resources became depleted and we needed to look across our northern boundary for help. Cooperative agreements have, of course, become very successful between the various State governments and the National Government which have been so important to the NFS Program. A word of caution however should be stated, especially because of the continued reduction of NFS professional firefighters and cutting of presuppression funding. No amount of cooperation or agreements can make up for such a loss of programs.

I commend Subcommittee Chairman VOLKMER for introducing this bill and for his aggressive leadership on this issue. During the 1988 fire season, his efforts led to the quick passage of an act that gave our firefighting agencies temporary authority to reimburse foreign firefighters. This enabled Canadian firefighters to provide immediate assistance during that crisis. This bill makes that temporary assistance permanent. H.R. 829 reinforces our friendship with Canada and uses the spirit of international cooperation to protect natural resources. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I also would like to commend the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. MORRISON] for the excellent cooperation that he has given and the constant concern members of our committee have shown.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 829, the Wildfire Suppression Assistance Act.

The purpose of this bill is to make permanent the temporary authority granted to the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior last year to provide for mutual aid with foreign firefighting organizations in fighting wildfires. Any agreements entered into under this authority would be made in consultation with the Secretary of State.

Mr. Speaker, you will recall that last year extensive wildfires in the forests of the Western United States placed a tremendous burden on our Government's firefighting resources. We were fortunate to have our good friends and neighbors to the north, the Canadians, offer their manpower and equipment to help us in controlling these wildfires.

The Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act, enacted last year, allowed the United States to legally reimburse the Canadians for their fuel, equipment, and other assistance they were able to provide. Officials of the USDA Forest Service have told me that the assistance they received from the Canadian Government as a result of this authority was invaluable in helping to control the wildfires that ravaged Yellowstone National Park and the surrounding area.

Mr. Speaker, the temporary authority provided to the Departments of Agriculture and the Interior expired December 31, 1988. This authority was made temporary simply to provide the other committees of jurisdiction in the House with additional time to review it. In particular, Mr. FASCELL, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, requested that the authority be provided on a temporary basis, until his committee had sufficient time to give the matter consideration this year. I am pleased to report that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has no objection to consideration of H.R. 829 today and I would like to insert into the RECORD a letter to this effect. I thank Chairman FASCELL, as well as Chairman UDALL of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, for their support of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues in the House to support this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I include for the RECORD a letter from Chairman FASCELL concerning jurisdiction in this matter:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, March 13, 1989.

Hon. E KIKA DE LA GARZA,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am writing in response to your request that the Committee on Foreign Affairs forego action on H.R. 829, the Wildfire Suppression Assistance Act, without prejudice to the Committee's jurisdiction.

It is my understanding that the intent of H.R. 829 is identical to legislation passed in the last Congress, but makes permanent the authorities contained in that legislation. Therefore, I have no objection to the consideration of this measure as reported by the Committee on Agriculture by the full House and would request that you make our correspondence on this issue a part of the record during Floor consideration.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, today the House will be considering H.R. 829, the Wildfire Suppression Assistance Act. I am proud to rise in support of this legislation and commend Mr. VOLKMER and the primary cosponsors of the bill for their timely consideration of this critical situation, well in advance of the summer fire season.

Last year, the greater Yellowstone area saw some of the worst fires in the park's history. Emergency firefighting assistance from Canada, made available by the Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act, was an important factor in preventing even greater depletion of our wildlands.

Over the past decade, we have seen a shift in the focus of dealing with the forest fire problem from readiness to last-minute, stopgap solutions. The over 80,000 acres of Yellowstone that were ravaged by fire last summer are testimony to the fact that forest fires spread too quickly, and are too destructive to rely on 11th hour decisions about how to cope with them.

By amending the duration of the Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act, this legislation ensures that future emergencies can be handled without lengthy bureaucratic review which greatly delays our wildfire suppression teams and makes their already difficult job virtually impossible. The passage of this H.R. 829 will demonstrate that Congress is ready and willing to adopt a comprehensive wildfire policy.

Mr. Speaker, being able to call on the Canadians for assistance in an emergency may be a sometime solution in an extraordinary situation, however, we must also ensure the long-term preparedness of our own firefighting resources.

The adoption of the Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act last summer is merely one example of how Congress' attitude to our Nation's fire problem tends to be reactive rather than proactive. The fire problem cannot be responsibly addressed if we only turn our attention to it in times of crisis. H.R. 829 represents a significant reversal of that trend.

As chairman of the congressional fire services caucus, I encourage my colleagues to support this bill, and to be responsive to other aspects of the fire problem that still demand attention.

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I took considerable pride in cosponsoring H.R. 829 and voting for it recently in the House Agriculture Committee. This legislation will permanently authorize the Temporary Emergency Wildfire Suppression Act which will allow the Agriculture and Interior Departments to enter into firefighting agreements with other nations, notably Canada. It will allow our Government to reimburse our international friends for the assistance they provide us in fighting fires.

After the experiences of last summer's catastrophic forest fire season in the Western United States, we must do everything in our power to guarantee that we are duly and truly prepared to tackle a similar challenge. The ability of our Government to use well trained firefighters and specialized equipment from Canada last summer was very helpful. H.R. 829 would merely give us the option to use this arrangement in the future.

I know of no opposition to this legislation. It has strong support from both sides of the aisle. Moreover, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture George Dunlop, speaking for the administration, gave a strong endorsement of H.R. 829 when he testified before the Subcommittee on Forests, Family Farms, and Energy earlier this month. I encourage my colleagues to support this worthy piece of legislation.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BILBRAY). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 829.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Joint Resolution 124 and H.R. 829, the legislation just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PEACE AND FAMINE RELIEF IN SUDAN

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15) concerning peace and famine relief in Sudan.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. CON. RES. 15

Whereas starvation and civil war have killed nearly 1,000,000 southern Sudanese civilians since 1983 and displaced 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 of southern Sudan's 6,000,000 people;

Whereas numerous and reliable reports from the field document that both sides of the conflict, the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as the "SPLA"), have not only neglected the welfare of southern Sudanese people, but in many instances have deliberately deprived southern Sudanese of food and medicine and have used food as a weapon of war;

Whereas combatants have massacred untold numbers of civilians, destroyed entire villages, and decimated the infrastructure in southern Sudan;

Whereas a national peace accord, which is essential both to an effective emergency relief effort and to a negotiated peace settlement, was endorsed by the SPLA and the Democratic Unionist Party in November 1988, but did not receive the agreement of the Government of Sudan;

Whereas the United States and other international donors have taken several significant steps to alleviate famine, including an October 1988 emergency airlift by the United States Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance and a relief operation carried out by the International Committee of the Red Cross in both rebel and government-held areas in southern Sudan;

Whereas such humanitarian efforts are crucial first steps but assist only a small fraction of the more than 2,000,000 Sudanese in dire need of relief;

Whereas the United States has a special relationship with the people and Government of Sudan, including the provision of more than $100,000,000 in bilateral and multilateral assistance in fiscal year 1988, the largest amount received by any nation in sub-Saharan Africa;

Whereas Secretary of State James A. Baker III, in a statement on February 8, 1989, emphasized that "starvation will almost certainly not end until the fighting ends," urged both the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to "put peace first and to agree to an early ceasefire" in order to facilitate relief, and called on "authorities at all levels on both sides to remove remaining obstacles and do everything possible to provide emergency relief to victims caught in garrison towns and other areas of the war zone"; and

Whereas the Secretary General of the United Nations, at the invitation of the Government of Sudan, has announced a relief conference to be held in Khartoum in March 1989: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress—

(1) commends Secretary of State Baker's statement of February 8, 1989, as a major step forward in dramatically focusing world attention upon the humanitarian disaster in Sudan and the urgent need for responsible action by the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to bring about a ceasefire, effective emergency relief, and implementation of a meaningful peace accord;

(2) commends the relief activities in Sudan of the Agency for International Development, the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance, international organizations, and American, international and indigenous private and voluntary agencies;

(3) condemns and deplores the use of food as a weapon by the Government of Sudan and the SPLA and calls upon each of them to respect and honor the safe passage of food and emergency relief supplies to civilians in affected areas;

(4) supports all efforts by the international community, private and voluntary agencies, and concerned governments to provide assistance to imperiled Sudanese, including cross-border feeding operations and prepositioning of food in southern Sudan;

(5) commends the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) for its success in working simultaneously with the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to deliver food and emergency assistance to civilians on both sides of the conflict, and support efforts by the ICRC to rapidly expand the volume of relief delivered and the number of sites reached;

(6) supports the expanding involvement of the Secretary General of the United Nations in promoting peace and relief activities in Sudan and commends the Government of Sudan for welcoming these efforts;

(7) urges the President and the Secretary of State to exercise vigorous international leadership in pressing for a genuine national reconciliation and an end to widescale starvation and suffering in Sudan, through forceful direct representations to the Government of Sudan and the SPLA, through sustained multilateral, diplomatic initiatives, and active United States-Soviet collaborations, and through the designation of a special United States Government envoy;

(8) urges the President and the Secretary of State to conduct a comprehensive reassessment of the United States' relationship with the Government of Sudan, including critical examination of future bilateral and multilateral assistance given by the United States to Sudan (other than humanitarian assistance), unless within 6 months after the date of adoption of this concurrent resolution—

(A) the Government of Sudan has made demonstrable progress in facilitating increased relief to displaced populations in areas it controls, through the instance, increased mobilization of key government resources and improved controls over government-armed militias; and

(B) the Government of Sudan has made significant progress in negotiations with the SPLA for a national peace accord and a cease-fire; and

(9) urges the President and the Secretary of State to impress upon the SPLA its special responsibility to permit the flow of international relief to civilians in government-controlled southern cities and towns, the imperative for the SPLA to facilitate assistance to noncombatants in SPLA-controlled areas and, finally, the importance for the SPLA to negotiate independently with the Government of Sudan for a national peace accord.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President and the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today the full House is to act on Senate Resolution 15, the Kennedy-Simpson resolution on Sudan. That resolution is identical to House Congressional Resolution 58, as amended. The House resolution was introduced by Congressman ACKERMAN, who momentarily will describe it.

I support this resolution wholeheartedly. It focuses congressional concern in a meaningful and direct way upon the tragedy underway in Sudan. Hundreds of thousands of innocent southern Sudanese have died each year since 1983. We need to take bold and decisive action to ensure that in 1989 several hundred thousand do not again perish.

This resolution is one important step in that direction. It enjoys strong bipartisan support in the Foreign Affairs Africa Subcommittee in the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and in the full Senate. I also want to pay tribute to my distinguished colleague, Mr. LELAND, who chairs the Select Committee on Hunger and with whom my subcommittee has worked so closely on this issue the past several months.

Through this resolution, Congress puts the Government of Sudan and the southern insurgents, the Sudan People's Liberation Army [SPLA] on notice that emergency relief to innocent civilians and a negotiated national peace accord are absolute imperatives. No less important, it signals that continued obstruction of these two ends by the Government of Sudan will jeopardize Sudan's access to future United States bilateral and multilateral assistance. There has been a need for some time to deliver this stark message: thanks to the efforts of Congressman ACKERMAN, Senators KENNEDY and SIMPSON, and others in both Chambers, that message is now coming across.

Until very recently, United States policy has been one of quiet diplomacy, marked by an unquestioning faith in the integrity and motivations of the Sudanese Government. This overly passive approach has proved ineffective on increasingly untenable on political and moral grounds. Over the past 2 years, the worst conceivable outcome which the United States has desired to prevent by its low-key approach has in fact largely materialized. In the meantime, the United States has demonstrated a tragic hesitation to pursue aggressively all options of delivery relief to the south. Moreover, we have been slow and reluctant to apply overt, sustained and multilateral diplomatic pressures upon the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to achieve peace.

There are some harsh and brutal lessons in what has happened, and what is likely to continue happening, in Sudan.

Fortunately, in the past month we have seen evidence of a new willingness on the part of the new Bush administration to register openly the United States abhorrence to what is taking place in Sudan, to make clear that a vast share of responsibility lies at the door of the Sudanese Government, and to signal its intentions to proceed aggressively to see that relief reaches the hundreds of thousands of imperiled Sudanese in SPLA-territory via cross-border deliveries.

Last week, a U.N.-sponsored conference in Khartoum focused on how to improve the delivery of emergency famine relief. Let us hope that commitments made by the Government of Sudan during the conference become reality.

I welcome these recent events. Secretary of State Baker and Julia Taft, Director of the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance, each deserve high praise for the attention they have devoted to Sudan. Congressman FRANK WOLF should also be commended for journeying personally to SPLA territory and to Khartoum to learn first hand what is taking place.

During the Easter recess, Congressman ACKERMAN, together with Congressmen LELAND and EMERSON, the chairman and ranking minority of the House Select Committee on Hunger, respectively, will visit Sudan, Ethiopia, and Kenya to examine the crisis in Sudan, its regional ramifications and the prospects for a positive United States influence in promoting peace and effective emergency relief. I look forward to a debriefing from them upon their return in early April.

Mr. Speaker, let me emphasize that at this critical moment—when the fate of the Sudanese Government hangs in the balance and the rains that interfere with distribution of relief supplies are but a few weeks away—we may still not act boldly enough to carry out our emerging policy.

Two critical policy questions remain: The answers to them may perhaps save hundreds of thousands of lives.

First, is the administration prepared to act aggressively enough, in conjunction with our friends in Europe, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia, to press the Sudan Government to implement the DUP-SPLA peace accord? That accord is the bottomline for peace in Sudan. The United States and other concerned governments must make clear that half-baked substitutes from the Government of Sudan are absolutely inappropriate and will only prolong the staggering suffering of innocent Sudanese.

Second, what exactly is the administration prepared to do, and in what timeframe, to meet the immediate emergency needs in Sudan—through all available channels—if we are to avoid seeing another one-quarter of a million Sudanese die in 1989?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish again to register my deep concern that United States military assistance apparently continues to flow to the Government of Sudan via "pipeline" moneys from previous years, even as new aid allocations decrease. This is a disturbing development which contradicts official statements critical of the Government of Sudan's behavior, as well as softening the impact of strong congressional statements of the kind contained in the resolution before us today.

According to the DOD Congressional Presentation Document, no military aid was obligated for fiscal years 1988 and 1989. Yet we signed agreements with the Government of Sudan—in the midst of this terrible crisis in which the Government of Sudan has thwarted relief efforts for its starving southern citizens and scuttled various national peace options—for $22.5 million in fiscal year 1988 and $10 million in fiscal year 1989.

Further, the United States is proposing to sign an additional $10 million in military aid agreements in fiscal year 1990 and to obligate another $5 million in military aid. Congress and the administration must each ask themselves what sort of signal this sends to the Government of Sudan.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in supporting Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 which I understand to be identical to House Concurrent Resolution 58, as amended by Mr. BEREUTER during subcommittee consideration.

Civil war and starvation have caused enormous human suffering in the Sudan, Africa's largest country. This tragically divided nation has long been considered a potential bread basket for the entire continent of Africa.

Sadly, however, civil war has decimated Sudan's potential productivity and resulted in hundreds of thousands of civilian casualties. The United States and other international donors have committed substantial resources to alleviating suffering in Sudan, including an October 1988 airlift and relief operations carried out in both rebel and government controlled areas in southern Sudan.

Secretary of State James A. Baker III recently urged the Government of Sudan and the SPLA rebels to agree to a cease-fire and to remove obstacles to the provision of emergency relief to victims caught in the war zone.

The resolution before us commends our Government and other international relief organizations, while deploring the use of food as a weapon of war. I support the resolution and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this resolution. I was an original cosponsor of its companion resolution here in the House, and I believe that its consideration this week is particularly timely.

I commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN], the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WOLPE], and certainly the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BROOMFIELD] for their leadership on this resolution.

For the past decade, Mr. Speaker, Sudan has received more aid from the United States than any other country in sub-Saharan Africa. As this resolution makes note, "the United States has a special relationship with the people and Government of Sudan." And, indeed, it is the responsibility that such a relationship imposes upon us, which has led to this resolution.

Sudan is a country in crisis, a crisis which represents the tragic consequences of political decisions that have been made in Khartoum by three successive regimes over the past 6 years. The list of misguided policies adopted by the government in Khartoum is very long. Equally as long is the list of abuses that have been committed by both sides in the Sudanese civil war.

This resolution is not an attempt to take sides in the war. It is an attempt to side with those millions of Sudanese people—north and south—who are the victims of that war.

We all hope, Mr. Speaker, that the reorganization of the governing coalition which is underway right now in the Sudanese parliament will lead to a new administration that will be committed to ending the civil war and getting relief to the starving—immediately.

Pending that outcome, however, we have the obligation to keep up the pressure and do all that we can to facilitate the delivery of food and medicine to the hundreds of thousands—even millions—of Sudanese people who are in imminent danger.

I will conclude by noting that the resolution commends Secretary of State Baker for his leadership in focusing world attention on the crisis in Sudan. It also commends AID, especially the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance, the International Committee of the Red Cross, and the various private relief agencies which have been working in Sudan under considerable duress.

Mr. Speaker, Sudan is the largest country in all of Africa. Sudan has been a friend of the United States—and the American people have a longstanding commitment to help the Sudanese people. It is this fact which makes the present crisis so tragic. And it is this fact which makes the status quo so unacceptable.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HOUGHTON], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Senate Concurrent Resolution 15.

The famine in Sudan, as many people have mentioned earlier, is real, it is serious, and, as such, being concerned citizens we are concerned about famine no matter where it occurs in this world.

My only wish, of course, is that we could become galvanized in our efforts the way we were at the time of the original famine in Ethiopia.

In the meantime here in the Sudan, as earlier in Ethiopia, the local political door slamming is being used on those who would want to cross the threshold to help our fellow human beings. The Government, guerrilla forces, as we all know, have both cold bloodedly blocked relief shipments of food to regions controlled by their enemies.

My colleagues know what Secretary Baker has said in his strong statement.

Strange, is it not, that those providing the out held hand, wanting to lighten the load and fill the stomachs and care for the needy, are rejected?

So this motion, while not earthshaking in its physical force, is still important and is important as a signal to the rest of the world and, as a signal to those people who are playing partisan political, callous process. It says that we are waiting, we are watching and if nothing changes we will act accordingly.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 and I commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN] for taking the initiative on this resolution in the House.

I traveled to Sudan in January and saw first hand the suffering and tragedy in that country. The conditions there are terrible and I am pleased that we are acting quickly on this resolution to put the Congress of the United States on record urging immediate steps to improve conditions there.

The Bush administration has acted quickly to improve conditions in Sudan. Secretary of State Baker's February 7 statement on peace and relief in Sudan has obviously had a positive impact on the situation in that country. In addition, U.S. food aid which recently began flowing into southern Sudan will save many lives in that region.

These are very positive steps that will undoubtedly help to relieve the suffering in Sudan.

This resolution calls on the administration to appoint a peace negotiator to help seek a temporary cease-fire so that food, medicine, clothing, and other supplies can reach those in need. I believe that this step, which would lead to free passage of food in both northern and southern Sudan, could be the step that averts massive famine in Sudan in 1989. Hundreds of thousands of lives could be saved.

Again, I wholeheartedly support this resolution and want to commend the gentleman from New York on his work on this issue.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, concerning peace and famine in the Sudan.

At this very moment, the Sudan is experiencing the worst famine on the globe. An estimated 1 million Sudanese have starved to death since 1983, including between 250,000 and 500,000 victims in 1988 alone. This condition dwarfs the devastation of the Ethiopian famine. More people have died this year in the Sudan than perished in the Armenian earthquake.

The 17th century philosopher and theologian, John Donne stated that "no man is an island * * * any man's death diminishes me because I am involved in mankind; and therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls, it tolls for thee."

America's deep humanitarian tradition seems to spring from Donne's words. This Nation's overwhelming acceptance of the responsibility to meet the global need for food assistance has led the United States to respond with massive amounts of food aid to Africa which makes us second to none in meeting the terrible scourge of famine.

Make no mistake about it, my friends, what is happening in the Sudan is a crime against humanity.

The situation in the Sudan is far worse than that which we experience in areas such as Ethiopia, which I have personally witnessed. In the Sudan, the problem is not the shortage of food. The rains have been good this year and a successful harvest is in. The cause of starvation is a brutal civil war in which both sides have resorted to using food as a weapon, deliberately preventing it from being distributed to those who so desperately need it for survival.

The current civil war between the Islamic North and the Christian South has dislocated the population and blocked food shipments. Hundreds of thousands have fled to Ethiopia in the south or north toward Khartoum. Most of the refugees lucky enough to escape the war zones are young boys which would indicate that women and small children have been left behind at the mercy of the famine.

The real tragedy of this situation is that neither side of the political struggle has showed any regard for the civilians. The SPLA rebels in the south have shot down relief aircraft, attacked food convoys, and besieged towns. The response of the Khartoum government has been totally inadequate or at best indifferent.

Repeated efforts by the international community, including the United States, to end the war and deliver food have met with only limited success. Even the Red Cross has found its ability to conduct relief operations are hampered by the political intransigence.

This legislation rightly condemns the use of food as a weapon of war and calls on both warring parties to provide safe passage for food relief efforts. The resolution also recommends that the Bush administration designate a special envoy who would work with the Sudanese Government and the SPLA to try and reach a settlement of the civil war.

Mr. Speaker, the message in passing this legislation today is clear. We can no longer remain silent in the face of deliberate, self-inflicted famine which results in the death of millions of innocent victims of political warfare. I urge passage of this legislation.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the author of the House version of the resolution before us, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the leadership for scheduling a vote on this resolution so quickly. The famine in Sudan is an extremely urgent matter and it is necessary that we give it our immediate attention. The Senate resolution we are considering is identical to House Concurrent Resolution 58, as amended, which I introduced 2 weeks ago. Fifty-six of our colleagues have cosponsored the legislation, including Chairman FASCELL, along with great leadership, Chairman WOLPE, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. BURTON, and in bipartisan fashion, Mr. SOLOMON and many, many other Members of the House and Senate.

I particularly want to thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF] for visiting the Sudan, seeing the tragedy first hand and personally bringing us such difficult news. Before this month is over, I intend to, along with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] to follow in his footsteps.

Mr. Speaker, there's no joy in this resolution, as we finally begin dealing with the terrible human suffering in Sudan. Actually, it's an embarrassment that we join the issue so late. It's an embarrassment that one-fourth to one-half Sudanese died of starvation in 1988. It's an embarrassment that the United Nations now estimates that 2 million Sudanese will need emergency food assistance in 1989 and that 100,000 innocent civilians will starve unless they receive relief before the rains begin in Sudan in late April. Most of all, it's an embarrassment that 1 million Sudanese have already died since 1983 not because of lack of food in Sudan, but because food is being used as a weapon in the civil war there.

Mr. Speaker, it has long since been time that we spoke out on this embarrassing, tragic, and deliberate famine in Sudan. We can in part do that through this concurrent resolution. The resolution condemns the use of food as a weapon by both the Government of Sudan and by the SPLA. It urges active United States-Soviet collaboration in finding a solution to the problem in Sudan and recommends the designation of a special United States Government envoy to work with both sides in the civil war. Most importantly, the resolution calls on the President and the Secretary of State to reassess United States-Sudanese relations, including a critical examination of our foreign aid, unless Khartoum facilitates relief to its starving masses and negotiates an end to the bloody civil war.

The broader message of the resolution is just as important. It says that we have seen enough death, enough suffering, enough children murdered by politics.

Only a few decades ago, the world stood by silently as millions of people were put to their deaths. But no one spoke up—they had excuses. They said they did not know. Well, today, Mr. Speaker, we know. There is a genocide being perpetrated.

One-half million dead, a million more to die this year. What greater terror than for a mother to watch her children starve and turn into skeletons before her eyes. Today we know.

We do not need more outrage after the fact. We must speak out now. Those who said never again must know that now is the time to speak out. We must not be accomplices to this terror, to this murder, to this genocide.

Too long have we sinned by our silence. Too many innocent people have died while we watched. We did not act sooner. Let us act now. Mr. Speaker, I implore our colleagues to support Senate Concurrent Resolution 15.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from New York for his leadership on this issue as well as the Subcommittee on Africa and its members. We do care; we are concerned. It is absolutely vital for the American people to speak on this subject whenever it becomes necessary for us to show our repulsion and our indignation on the kinds of events that are taking place in the Sudan.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PAYNE], a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs' Subcommittee on Africa, I rise in strong support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15.

The urgency of the situation in the Sudan requires that the United States, as the leader of the free world, act swiftly and decisively to alleviate the terrible human suffering plaguing the men, women, and children in that war-torn country.

It is estimated that between 200,000 and 500,000 people were killed by starvation last year in the Sudan. Every day that goes by without a resolution to the civil war means that more lives will be senselessly lost.

We can not eradicate hunger in the Sudan until we bring an end to the tragic civil war which has been tearing the country asunder since 1983. The use of food as a weapon is unspeakably cruel. Looking at photographs of children wasted by lack of nourishment, it is hard to believe that both sides have used this practice freely.

We are reminded of the poet Robert Burns' observation that "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." By approving this resolution today, the United States is sending a strong signal that we will not tolerate deliberate starvation as a political tool.

There have been some encouraging signs. At the United Nations conference last week, the Sudanese Government agreed to cooperate with efforts to end the fighting and to facilitate delivery of food supplies. Our Nation must be watchful to see that these words are converted to action.

Now is the time for the United States of America to stand before the world and exert positive leadership. We have shown in the past that with determination we can accomplish near miracles. The Camp David accords are one example of the way that American influence can help mold a solution to even the most bitter and long-standing hostilities, and the recent accord in Angola as it relates to Cuban troops and free elections in Namibia.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend our Chairman, Mr. WOLPE, for his leadership on this issue. Secretary of State James Baker deserves recognition for urging "both sides to remove remaining obstacles and to do everything possible to provide emergency relief to victims * * *"

The passage of this resolution today will be an important step forward in our quest to improve the plight of the Sudanese people by promoting peace and freedom from hunger.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. I rise in support of the resolution. The return of famine to the horn of Africa is one of the great tragedies of the past year. It is difficult to assess, much less comprehend, the extent of the starvation, but is safe to say that hundreds of thousands of people have starved to death in the last year. Unless decisive action is taken in the next few weeks, this tragedy will be repeated during 1989. We must act now.

The return of famine to Sudan is a great tragedy, but an even greater tragedy is the fact that the hunger is largely man made. This time the culprit is not so much natural disaster but civil war. Even more frustrating than the return of hunger to that country is the difficulties the civil war is creating in helping those in need. The civil war is not only causing the famine but is preventing the international community from helping the victims.

It appears that both sides in the civil war are guilty of using food as a political weapon. Unless this situation changes, hundreds of thousands more are at risk of starvation during the coming year. I, therefore, call on both sides of the conflict to honor a ceasefire, resolve their differences, and above all, allow the international relief community to get food to those in need. Time is urgent if we are to prevent an even greater tragedy.

The Select Committee on Hunger, on which I serve as the vice chairman, has been following the situation in Sudan closely during the past year. In 2 weeks I will be going to the region with Representatives LELAND and ACKERMAN to assess the situation and bring congressional pressure to bear in removing the roadblocks to peace and relief.

This resolution also adds congressional weight to the peace process and the relief effort. It urges the administration to redouble its diplomacy by designating a special envoy to focus on the problems in the region. It also urges all parties to allow the food to reach the people and to stop using food as a political weapon.

If containing and relieving and alleviating famine is to succeed, the international community must use its collective pressure to impress upon all sides in the conflict the need for peace. This resolution is an important contribution to that effort, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of closing the debate, I wish to yield time to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND], chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger, but before doing so, let me just express my appreciation both to him and to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] for the extraordinary leadership the Select Committee on Hunger has provided. We have worked intimately with that committee over many, many months.

I also want to pay a special tribute to Mr. Jeff Clark, a staff member of that select committee, who headed up the international effort and who was key to really getting the staff effort in gear that led to today's resolution. Mr. Clark has left the committee for another assignment, and he will be sorely missed. I am most appreciative of his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND].

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, let me join the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] in his comments concerning Mr. Clark, who was a vital part of the staff of the Select Committee on Hunger and who has left to go with the Carters to create an entity that would deal with hunger and other kinds of problems in Africa for former President Jimmy Carter.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution before this body which reflects the growing concern of so many House and Senate colleagues on the worsening famine which is enveloping the Sudan. The situation in Sudan threatens the lives of hundreds of thousands of Sudanese civilians caught in a deadly vice between opposing forces in a struggle not of their making. Civil war, religious and ethnic strife, the reckless arming of mercenaries and bandits, and a disregard for the concept of safe passage of relief convoys have created a desperate situation. Since the conflict first erupted in 1983, perhaps 1 million civilians have perished. Last year the estimates were that some 250,000 or more Sudanese escaping the conflict starved to death.

The Southern Sudanese who perished from famine in 1988 were lost because of the indifference and hostility of government and rebel authorities—military and civilian—who proved to be quite willing to use food as a weapon in their conflict. Relief agencies have been denied access to those in need as both sides maneuver and manipulate the affected population for their own gain. The abuses of the concept of safe passage of relief items have been well-documented. Relief planes and truck convoys have been the target of gunfire. Private relief agencies have been expelled by the Government and harassed by the rebels. Food for the dislocated population has been repeatedly stolen by soldiers.

The truth is, thousands of Sudanese civilians are needlessly losing their lives as politicians and field commanders sacrifice them as pawns in this conflict. Congressional delegations and relief agency experts over the past 8 months have verified—the extent of the Sudan emergency and documented its causes.

We cannot easily alter the situation in the Sudan. But we can be certain that no one doubts the position of the U.S. Government on the question of using food as a political weapon. We must be heard condemning this practice by whomever may be attempting it—and heard in a loud voice. We must be certain that our own relief efforts extend to those located across arbitrary political lines. We must resolve that the complexity of the situation will not fatigue us but, instead, that the horror of it will result in our determined efforts to make certain that these people not starve.

It is important to note that relief operations launched by the U.S. Government—specifically those of AID's Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance—and the private relief agencies within The past few months have succeeded in reaching many desperate people in the Sudan with food, medicine, clothing * * * and a chance for survival. These efforts prove that more can be done. We in Congress must now resolve that more will be done.

The passage of a congressional resolution will not, by itself, satisfy our obligations to the victims of famine in the Sudan. But passage of this resolution gives a clear signal that we cannot be among those indifferent to the tragedy. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this measure, and I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN] for his tireless efforts to assist the people of the Sudan and his leadership in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to thank the chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for his incredible leadership and untiring efforts in this matter. I commend also the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON].

The gentleman from Missouri and I, along with the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN], will be traveling to the Sudan to try to see if in fact the Congress can do more than it has been doing.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] for yielding this time to me.

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, today I rise in strong support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 concerning the civil war and concomitant famine in the Sudan. First, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that the author of the House companion bill (H. Con. Res. 58) Representative GARY ACKERMAN, the House Select Committee on Hunger and the House Foreign Affairs Committee should be commended on the job they and their staffs have done to alert Congress to the ongoing civil war and tragic famine that is afflicting this vast nation on the Horn of Africa.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, this measure condemns the use of food as a weapon in Sudan's civil war and encourages both the Sudanese Government in Khartoum and the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army [SPLA], based in the south, to come to terms with their nation's famine problem by beginning to look toward resolving the war.

The war and famine in this beleaguered nation was responsible for the deaths of at least a quarter of a million people in 1988 alone. Additionally, the Khartoum government and the SPLA have hampered the delivery of relief aid claiming that incoming aid from any source is politically and militarily motivated. Sadly, after 30 years of intermittent civil war there are no winners and a legacy of starvation and displacement will affect the makeup of Sudan through to the next century.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that no measure can emphasize enough the importance of addressing this emergency with the urgency that it truly deserves. Even if a miraculous peace settlement were to be enacted today, relief workers and agencies would still be very hard pressed to assist the hundreds of thousands of starving refugees before the rainy season begins in a few short weeks.

It is very important that the U.S. Congress and the Bush administration carefully examine this situation as it specifically relates to our aid commitment to the Khartoum government. Last year our Government gave Sudan $100 million in aid with no conditions or provisions for improving its human rights atrocities and ending the war. The time has come for our Government to begin to hold the Sudanese combatants accountable for the death and destruction that it has wrought against its own people and Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 is an appropriate starting point.

In closing, I encourage all of our colleagues to vote for the passage of this bill on behalf of the people of the Sudan.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution and urge all Members to join in this bipartisan effort to end the massive human suffering now taking place in Sudan. The resolution which is before us today had bipartisan support in the other body and a companion resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 58, has bipartisan support in the House.

Through the efforts of our colleagues, some of whom have recently visited the Sudan, we have all gained greater knowledge of the tragedy which is now unfolding in that unfortunate country. We have become aware of the principal cause of the suffering. It is the civil war now raging in the Sudan and leaving in its wake many civilian victims who are displaced and impoverished or who starve to death for lack of delivery of available food.

As noted in the resolution, our own Government and other donors have labored tirelessly and are working now to bring food to the needy; but in order to adequately address those needs they need the cooperation of the Sudanese Government and the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army, which is contesting the government's authority. A national peace accord is needed to enable the people of Sudan to devote their considerable talents to developing their country. An immediate cease fire in the war is needed so as to immediately reduce the suffering by bringing assistance to those in need.

The timeliness of our action is unquestionable as thousands of Sudanese have died over the past 2 years. More will be lost if the war is not stopped and the international community does not respond to the existing needs.

The new administration under President Bush is taking a fresh approach to the situation in Sudan. Secretary of State Baker has stated "the starvation will not end until the fighting ends." I applaud this and urge the administration to strengthen its efforts to bring peace to that long-troubled land.

In closing, I wish to commend the efforts of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN], the author of the House resolution, and all those Members who have worked to bring the attention of the Congress to this matter.

Mrs. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 58. This resolution commends Secretary of State Baker for focusing attention on the humanitarian disaster in Sudan and for calling for a cease-fire in the civil war.

This legislation also commends the relief activities of the Agency for International Development [AID], the International Committee of the Red Cross [ICRC], and other agencies and organizations whose successful relief efforts have helped save the lives of many persons in Sudan.

In addition, I believe that this resolution sends an important message regarding the relationship of United States aid to Sudan and the need to encourage Sudan to make immediate progress in facilitating relief efforts to its displaced population and to negotiating a peace accord. That is, this resolution urges the administration to conduct a comprehensive reassessment of the United States relationship with the Sudanese Government and to reexamine United States aid to Sudan, unless the Sudanese Government has made demonstrable progress regarding the conflicts in Sudan, within 6 months of enactment of this resolution.

More than 1 million people have starved to death because of the conflict between the Sudanese Government and the rebels fighting them. Too often in the Sudan, the withholding of food from civilians has been used as a tactic or a strategy of war.

As a result, thousands of Sudanese, many of whom are women, children and elderly men, have starved to death, been displaced, or sold into slavery. Today, many thousands more are at risk of meeting the same fate.

Surely, we cannot continue to let this happen. The United States has a historical commitment to achieving the basic human rights and dignity of all persons. We cannot abandon this commitment and moral responsibility now.

We must make sure that policies taken by the United States continue to reflect principles that emphasize the value of human life, regardless of religious, ethnic, or political affiliation.

The opportunity to support initiatives which will promote a peaceful and long-term solution to the problems in the Sudan is in the best interest of the United States and Sudan. I would like to commend my colleague for introducing this resolution and urge President Bush and Secretary Baker on behalf of the United States to lead the way nationally and internationally to help bring an end to the unnecessary, yet tragic situation in Sudan as soon as possible.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support House Concurrent Resolution 58 concerning peace and famine in Sudan. The situation in the Sudan is desperate. Starvation and war have killed nearly 1 million southern Sudanese civilians since 1983 and displaced 2 to 3 million of southern Sudan's 6 million people.

It is obvious that both the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army have not only neglected the welfare of the southern Sudanese people, but in many instances have deliberately deprived southern Sudanese of food and medicine and have used food as a weapon of war.

This resolution commends international relief efforts and calls on the President and the Secretary of State to exercise vigorous international leadership in pressing for national reconciliation in the Sudan and reassess United States-Sudanese relations if Sudan's Government fails to make progress toward facilitating relief to civil war victims and in cease-fire negotiations during the next 6 months.

I commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN] for his outstanding work on this issue, and I urge the unanimous adoption of this important resolution.

Mr. HALL of Ohio. I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, which calls on the President and Secretary of State to reassess United States-Sudanese relations and pursue all efforts to facilitate a negotiated end to that country's bloody, tragic, civil strife. I was in Ethiopia in December 1987 when I saw a videotape of Sudanese boys taking refuge in western Ethiopia. I was stunned and shocked by the images of young boys fleeing the Sudan for Ethiopia and the terrible physical shape they were in when they arrived. Even more horrible was what the video could not show: many of the boys who had left their homes had died on the way.

I would like to compliment my colleague on the Select Committee on Hunger, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN], for so forcefully taking the lead on this issue. He has worked diligently and effectively to encourage the State Department and Agency for International Development to focus on ending the conflict while helping the needy. I salute the expeditious work of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] in his effective efforts as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa. Today we are hearing bipartisan concern voiced that United States policy has not been vigorous enough toward the Sudan. It is my hope that these strong statements from Members of Congress will bring about a much-needed change in U.S. policy—in time to save millions of lives.

It has taken the world much too long to recognize the massive number of suffering people in this huge African nation. Under circumstances of peace, this could be a prosperous country. Under today's prolonged tragedy, perhaps as many as 1 million Sudanese have already died. Unless enormous quantities of food are positioned near population centers in the southern part of this country, another half a million innocent people—most of them women and children—will perish this spring and summer.

The worst aspect of the Sudanese calamity is that people have created this situation; it is not the result of a bad harvest or a flood or a swarm of locusts. It is the result of war, and the criminal willingness of both warring sides to use food as a weapon.

Two things need to happen: First, enough food needs to be positioned where those in need can get it now, and in sufficient quantity so they have access to adequate food until the next harvest comes in 6 months; and second, at the same time, President Bush and Secretary of State Baker need to make every effort to bring both sides together to negotiate a just and lasting peace. Without peace this tragedy will continue into the next decade. It has already been permitted to continue much too long. We must help stop it now. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution as one act along the way of restoring sanity and bringing an end to the politics of hunger in the Sudan.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution before us today. It is a resolution based on House Concurrent Resolution 58, of which I am an original cosponsor. I strongly believe that it is an appropriate response to the horror that is occurring in the Sudan right now.

Sudan is in the midst of a severe famine. Since 1983, an estimated 1 million Sudanese have starved to death. In 1988 alone, between a quarter and a half million people have died because of the prolonged, bloody civil war, in which both sides use food as a weapon. Both the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army have actively prevented food and medicine from reaching the people who desperately need it.

It is time for the U.S. Congress to speak out against this ongoing tragedy. Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 does just that. It condemns the use of food as a weapon by both sides. It urges the U.S. Government to focus international pressure on both sides to bring an end to the war. Moreover, it calls upon the President and Secretary of State to reexamine our foreign aid to Khartoum. We currently provide $100 million in aid to a government which insists on continuing an inhumane war despite the horrific cost it wreaks on the innocent civilians—including children—in the Sudan. The resolution gives the Government of Sudan 6 months to demonstrate progress in facilitating famine relief efforts for the hundreds of thousands who are starving, and to make genuine efforts to negotiate an end to the war.

Mr. Speaker, there is no strategic goal important enough to remain silent while people starve to death. The Government of Sudan must realize that there is a broad bipartisan group within Congress who will not tolerate the continued use of calculated starvation tactics. The resolution before us today sends that message. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Select Committee on Hunger and a cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 58, I strongly support this resolution concerning peace and famine relief in the Sudan. I also commend my colleague on the Hunger Committee, Mr. ACKERMAN, for taking the lead in this effort.

Earlier this month, the Select Committee on Hunger held a hearing which looked at the devasting famine in Sudan. The testimony presented at that hearing highlighted the situation and demonstrated the need for action. It is estimated that 1 million Sudanese have starved to death since 1983, including a quarter to a half a million victims in the last year alone. Millions more in southern Sudan have been displaced from their homes.

The truly disastrous aspect of this situation is that the famine is not the result of drought or some other natural catastrophe but is directly related to the civil war between the government of Sudan and the Sudanese Peoples Liberation Army [SPLA]. Both sides in the civil war have used food as a weapon which has led to the famine and have prevented efforts to provide relief to affected individuals.

The resolution we have before us today is extremely important for it conveys to the administration, the Sudanese people and the rest of the world our great concern and outrage at this man-made famine. It says that we have seen enough suffering and disregard for human life and that the U.S. Congress is unwilling to remain silent on this atrocity.

I strongly support this resolution and urge my colleagues to support it as well.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DE LA GARZA). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE] that the House suspend the rules and concur in the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15).

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate concurrent resolution just concurred in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING AID TO PAY CERTAIN EXPENSES FOR ELECTIONS IN PANAMA

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 1373) to authorize the Agency for International Development to pay the expenses of an election observer mission for the 1989 Presidential elections in Panama.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 1373

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXPENSES OF OBSERVER MISSION FOR 1989 ELECTIONS IN PANAMA.

The Administrator of the Agency for International Development is authorized to use any funds described in section 2 to pay the expenses of an election observer mission for the 1989 Presidential elections in Panama.

SEC. 2. DESCRIPTION OF FUNDS WHICH MAY BE USED.

In carrying out section 1, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development may use any unearmarked funds that are available to carry out chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) or chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

SEC. 3. RESTRICTIONS ON ASSISTANCE FOR PANAMA NOT APPLICABLE.

Funds may be used in accordance with this Act without regard to any provision of law which would otherwise prohibit the use of foreign assistance funds with respect to Panama.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT].

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1373 would authorize the Agency for International Development to pay the expenses of an election observer mission to the May 1989 Presidential elections in Panama, notwithstanding existing provisions of law that might have the effect of prohibiting such action.

These expenses would come out of already appropriated funds.

An earlier version of the bill was reported unanimously by the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs on March 2. The bill before us, which contains a minor technical change, was reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning.

As all the Members know, Panama has run afoul of various restrictions on aid because of political conditions there, because it is in arrears in its debt repayments, and because of allegations regarding narcotics trafficking. But I am sure none of us would want the Agency for International Development to be precluded by these restrictions from sending an election observer mission to Panama. This bill enables the AID to do that, and that is all this bill does.

Mr. Speaker, there was no opposition to this bill in the committee, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to offer my support for H.R. 1373, legislation introduced by the ranking Republican member of the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, BOB LAGOMARSINO, authorizing the Agency for International Development to pay the expenses of an election observer mission for the upcoming 1989 Presidential elections in Panama.

The legislation before us authorizes AID to expend funds, which I understand have already been set aside, for an election observer mission for the 1989 Presidential elections in Panama. Specifically, this legislation waives any legal restrictions which might have had the unintentional effect of banning such action.

It is essential that the Congress be on the record as supporting any legitimate activity that promotes democratic activities in Panama.

I compliment my colleague, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, on this fine legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to my good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of my legislation, H.R. 1373, authorizing the Agency for International Development to pay for expenses of an election observer mission for the 1989 Presidential elections in Panama.

As AID began its preparations for making a grant to the National Democratic Institute and the National Republican Institute for International Affairs for an election observer mission, lawyers for AID ran into some problems. After considerable study of existing laws, they believe that a number of provisions in current law prevent them from using appropriated funds for such an election observer mission.

For example, some of the provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act dealing with countries in arreas in debt payments to the United States, and provisions relating to drug enforcement and foreign government officials engaged in narcotics trafficking would have the effect of prohibiting AID from funding an election observer team for Panama. Obviously, it is in the interests of the United States to monitor closely the electoral process in Panama, and we should do everything necessary to ensure that we have clear reading on what happens in the upcoming Presidential elections in Panama.

To overcome the legal problems that would prevent the United States from funding an election observer team, I introduced H.R. 1373, which provides for an exception to allow an observer mission to be sent for the Panamanian elections. The measure has strong bipartisan suppport and the administration supports this legislation as well.

All of us in the Congress and in the administration are anxious to see free, fair, and open democratic elections take place in Panama. It is vital that we have competent, impartial international observers on the scene to report the conduct of the elections in Panama and to be able to make recommendations based on the results of those elections. Our interests in Panama are of such great importance, it is imperative that we have firsthand knowledge about the promotion of democratic institutions in Panama.

I urge my colleagues to give their strong support to this legislation.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support H.R. 1247, a bill to authorize the Agency for International Development to pay the expenses of an election observer mission for the May 1989 Presidential elections in Panama and I commend the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] for initiating this measure.

In view of the recent political turmoil in Panama, it is obvious that an election observer is needed to help guarantee a just, open, and democratic election result in that nation.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the adoption of this bill.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1373, to authorize the Agency for International Development to pay for the expenses of an international election observer mission for the 1989 Presidential elections in Panama.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is to correct a legislative oversight in the current prohibition on United States assistance to Panama. While we, of course, do not wish to supply any United States aid to the government of dictator Noriega, it is in the United States interests to support indigenous efforts to promote democratic development in Panama. Free and fair elections leading to the establishment of a truly representative government are part of that development. This measure is designed to overcome the current prohibition on the use of United States funds to support a nonpartisan and international election observer mission to Panama for the May 7 Presidential, legislative, and municipal elections, the first elections since the fraudulent elections of 1984.

AID will make a grant, from already authorized and appropriated funds, to the National Democratic Institute and the National Republican Institute for International Affairs. These two private organizations will organize the mission, similar to those that they conducted in the Philippines in 1986, in Haiti in 1987, and in Chile and Pakistan in 1988.

I commend the author of the legislation, Mr. LAGOMARSINO of California, for this important initiative which was approved unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning. The Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs and the Subcommittee on Human Rights and international organizations agreed to waive consideration of this measure in order to expedite House consideration of it. However, the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee did agree to the text of H.R. 1247, a nearly identical measure, last week. I thank the chairmen and ranking minority members of those subcommittees, Mr. CROCKETT, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, Mr. YATRON, and Mr. BEREUTER for their cooperation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge immediate adoption of H.R. 1373.

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I, too, have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1373.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

COMMENDING ISRAEL AND EGYPT ON 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF TREATY OF PEACE

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 187) to commend the Governments of Israel and Egypt on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the Treaty of Peace between Israel and Egypt.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.J. RES. 187

To commend the Governments of Israel and Egypt on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the Treaty of Peace between Israel and Egypt.

Whereas in Washington, District of Columbia, on March 26, 1979, the Governments of Israel and Egypt, with the support and encouragement of the United States, signed a treaty of peace formally ending their state of war;

Whereas this treaty, the only peace agreement between Israel and any Arab nation, remains a crucial element in fostering peace in the Middle East;

Whereas under terms of this historic document Israel and Egypt agreed to end the state of war between them, Israel fully withdrew its military forces and civilian settlements from the Sinai Peninsula, and Israel and Egypt established formal diplomatic relations, including the exchange of ambassadors;

Whereas the establishment of peace between Israel and Egypt demonstrates that direct bilateral negotiations are the most effective way to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict and can lead to lasting and mutually beneficial results;

Whereas the other parties to the conflict have been unwilling to enter into direct bilateral negotiations but continue to maintain a state of war against Israel;

Whereas the continuation of the conflict has exacted a high cost in human lives and human suffering from both Israelis and Arabs; and

Whereas the treaty has allowed the peoples of Israel and Egypt to begin to build a network of cultural, economic, personal, and political contacts and relations among themselves: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States Government—

(1) commends Israel and Egypt for their historic act of courage and statesmanship in signing the Treaty of Peace of March 26, 1979;

(2) calls upon the President to mark this historic anniversary with appropriate public activities;

(3) welcomes the willingness of Israel and Egypt to continue to observe the international obligations they have accepted which have contributed to the peace and stability of the region; and

(4) calls upon other Arab nations and the Palestinians to follow the example of Israel and Egypt, to join actively in the peace process, to renounce the state of war and acts of violence, and to enter into face-to-face negotiations with Israel to achieve a just and lasting peace.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DE LA GARZA). Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS].

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to express my deep appreciation to the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East [Mr. HAMILTON]; the ranking Republican member of the full committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD]; and the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], for their cooperation and support in bringing this critical resolution before the House.

This month, Mr. Speaker, we celebrate the 10th anniversary of the Treaty of Peace between the State of Israel and the State of Egypt. It was in our own city of Washington on March 26, 1979, that these two governments, with the support and the encouragement of the Government of the United States, signed a treaty of peace formally ending their state of war.

This treaty, Mr. Speaker, is the only peace agreement in existence between Israel and any Arab nation and it remains the crucial cornerstone of stability in the entire Middle East. Under terms of this historic document, Israel and Egypt agreed to end the state of war between them. Israel fully withdrew all its military forces and dismantled all its civilian settlements in the Sinai Peninsula, and the two countries, Egypt and Israel, established formal diplomatic relations, including the exchange of Ambassadors.

This peace treaty, Mr. Speaker, demonstrates that direct face-to-face negotiations are the most effective and possibly the only way to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict through face-to-face negotiations, which in this case led to a lasting and mutually beneficial peace treaty.

For too long a very high human cost has been exacted from both the Israelis and the Arabs in the region, because the other countries in the area have refused to do what Egypt has done, sit down in face-to-face direct negotiations.

I want to pay tribute to the late Egyptian President Sadat who flew the Jerusalem to initiate this critically important step and who paid for his courage with his life.

Our resolution, Mr. Speaker, commends Israel and Egypt for their historic courage and statesmanship in signing the treaty of peace. Our resolution calls on our President to mark this historic anniversary with appropriate festive public activities.

We welcome the willingness of Israel and Egypt to continue to observe all their international obligations which so heavily contribute to the peace and stability of the region.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we call on all Arab nations and Palestinians in the area to follow the example of Israel and Egypt, to join actively in the peace process, to renounce the state of war and to renounce the acts of violence and to enter into face-to-face negotiations with the State of Israel to achieve a lasting and just peace.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my strong support for Congressman LANTOS' resolution, House Joint Resolution 187, commemorating the 10th anniversary of the historic peace treaty between Israel and Egypt. It is proper that we should celebrate this courageous treaty between these two great nations.

In 1979, after 30 years of a state of war, two farsighted leaders, Prime Minister Menachem Begin of Israel and President Anwar Sadat of Egypt, came together to forge a lasting peace between their two countries. This treaty was possible because both sides sought to find a permanent solution to their differences. Both leaders wanted to give peace a chance and take a risk for peace. Anwar Sadat risked alienating the Arab world, and eventually paid for his act of courage with his life in 1981. Menachem Begin risked the security of Israel itself and the anger of his own people when he gave up the Sinai, including all of the existing Israeli settlements there.

The result has been 10 years of peace based on mutual recognition and respect. The success of this treaty demonstrates that direct negotiations between the differing parties can have impressive results. Israel and Egypt are now spared the expense and waste of constant conflict. Both countries are now enjoying the benefits of peace.

In light of the present tragic disturbance in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, I believe all parties should demonstrate the same spirit of reconciliation and trust that Menachem Begin and Anwar Sadat demonstrated 10 years ago. That is the only way to a just and lasting peace.

The United States stands ready, as it did 10 years ago, to act as an honest broker in the pursuit of peace. We wish to assist this process in any way possible.

After 40 years of conflict, the Israeli and Arab peoples have suffered long enough.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my distinguished ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] in supporting House Joint Resolution 187.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to support House Joint Resolution 187, to commend the Governments of Israel and Egypt on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt and I commend the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] for his work on this measure.

It has been 10 tumultuous years since March 26, 1979, when the Governments of Israel and Egypt, with the support of the United States, signed a treaty of peace, formally ending their state of war and many of us were elated to witness the signing of that treaty on the White House lawn.

That treaty is significant, because it is the only peace agreement between Israel and any Arab nation. The establishment of peace between Israel and Egypt demonstrates that direct, bilateral negotiation is the only effective way to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution calls upon other Arab nations and the Palestinians to follow the stellar example set by Israel and Egypt to join actively in the peace process, to renounce acts of violence, and to enter into face-to-face negotiations with Israel to achieve a lasting peace. I strongly urge my colleagues to unanimously adopt this resolution.

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 187, commending the Governments of Israel and Egypt on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the peace treaty between these two countries. At the outset, I want to commend our distinguished colleague from California [Mr. LANTOS] who sponsored this resolution, as well as the distinguished majority and minority leaders of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] for their work on this issue.

At a time when the level of conflict in the Middle East is again high, it is useful to look back and take encouragement from the shining achievement of Camp David. With the help of the United States, the two major players broke through nearly 20 years of hostilities to bring about this remarkable achievement. Ten years later, it still stands as a model of what can be accomplished through persistence, dedication and the vision of peace shared by Prime Minister Begin, President Sadat, and President Carter.

While we now face new and rapidly changing circumstances, the need for peace remains urgent and calls for a renewed commitment by all parties concerned to break the current stalemate through direct bilateral negotiations. The resolution correctly calls upon all states in the region, and the Palestinians, to follow the example set by Israel and Egypt in the 10-year-old treaty, and enter direct negotiations to bring about a comprehensive peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 187 is a timely reminder of what has already been accomplished in bringing about peace in the Middle East, and how that accomplishment can stimulate further progress in this critical region of the world. I urge approval of the resolution.

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ].

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I want, first of all, to pay tribute to my very good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS], the author of this resolution, for bringing this legislation before us today. There is no Member in the House who cares more deeply about the cause of peace in the Middle East and probably none who has done more to advance it than the author of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, this is truly an extraordinary accomplishment which we commemorate today. The treaty between Israel and Egypt bringing to an end four decades of unremitting conflict between these two countries was surely one of the most significant diplomatic achievements in the history of this bloody and brutal century. Perhaps not since 1904, when President Theodore Roosevelt was able to facilitate the Treaty of Portsmouth between Russia and Japan bringing an end to the conflict between those two countries, has an American President played so creative a role in facilitating the cause of peace abroad as did President Carter at the historic negotiations which took place at Camp David and at a time, Mr. Speaker, when there are so many people both in our own country and around the world who look at Israel and feel that it is acting in an intransigent fashion.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to point out that in the late 1970's, when Israel was confronted with a credible offer of peace from an Arab country, it was willing to make the most far-reaching concessions in order to achieve peace and, similarly, I think this gives us hope that if the Arabs ever again come forward with a truly credible offer of peace, it will elicit a comparably forthcoming response on the part of Israel.

I think this resolution is an extremely timely one, and I do hope it will encourage all of the countries in the region to reflect on the important lessons of this historic agreement.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS].

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. Mr. Speaker, I thank my vice chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, although it may seem a little redundant to my good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS], I do want to join the growing crowd of acclaimants for the gentleman's aggressiveness and farsightedness in seizing this issue and bringing it to the attention of the American people and, specifically, to this Congress.

More specifically to the point, it is a marvelous thing that we can, I think, in this body even recognize those minimal achievements wherein the U.S. leadership has played a little hand in bringing about a modicum of peace in an area which needs it so badly.

I, too, would like to join the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] in commenting on the role of leadership portrayed by Mr. Carter, who was President of the United States at that time and not of my own political faith, but I think if he is remembered for anything in the history of this country, it will be for the historic achievement of bringing about a real breakthrough of bringing about the possibility, the potential of the absence of war between two major participants in the Mideast.

Mr. Speaker, further along that line, that probably is the greatest achievement, that there has been no physical violence, no armed conflict between these two countries in the 10 years, that they met at the table with honor and they agreed to terms of peaceful progress in that region, and I believe that that is to be highly commended.

Egypt has had great leadership during that time, as has Israel, and the gentlemen who led at that time, Mr. Begin and Mr. Sadat, are both to be commended, one, of course, in absentia, but he is in the memory of peace lovers throughout the world forever, and Mr. Begin in is retirement in Israel.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage, I would only hope that other Arab leaders could take their lead from this initiative and realize that there is much more to be gained for their own people, for their own area in terms of straight economics, certainly in military security, certainly in physical integrity of their land and in hope and in promise of peace and prosperity for future generations of unborn in both countries and in all the areas of the Mideast.

Mr. Speaker, it is only tragic that we recognize that other Arab leaders have not seen fit to come forward as aggressively as Mr. Sadat and as courageously as Mr. Sadat and certainly as farsightedly as Mr. Sadat.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to add my comments and, of course, my congratulations to the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] and all the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and Members of this body today to bring this issue to the attention of the American people that peace is possible, but it does take a great deal of leadership.

To summarize, Winston Churchill once said, "It is better to talk, talk, talk than to shoot, shoot, shoot," and that certainly applies to the Mideast today.

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank all of my colleagues for their support.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DE LA GARZA). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 187).

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXPRESSING SENSE OF THE HOUSE CONCERNING DEATH THREATS ISSUED BY AYATOLLAH KHOMEINI AGAINST AUTHOR SALMAN RUSHDIE

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution (H. Res. 102) expressing the sense of the House of Representatives concerning the death threats issued by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran against British author Salman Rushdie and other persons associated with the publication and distribution of the book, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. RES. 102

Whereas the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran issued death threats against British citizen Salman Rushdie, author of the novel The Satanic Verses, and other persons associated with the publication and distribution of the book;

Whereas the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Iran is a party, guarantees to everyone "the right to freedom of expression, including the freedom to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media";

Whereas the death threats issued by the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini represent a pernicious and flagrant violation of the internationally recognized right of freedom of expression and of the freedom of writers and publishers in every country;

Whereas one of the most hallowed principles of the United States is the fundamental right to freedom of expression;

Whereas the right of American citizens to seek and receive information has been restricted by the deplorable attempt to practice censorship by death threat;

Whereas the Ayatollah's death threats are an incitement to terrorist acts in flagrant violation of internationally accepted rules of behavior and contrary to the Charter of the United Nations;

Whereas respect for a diversity of religious views is a fundamental tenet on which the United States is based and the American people condemn all forms of religious intolerance and discrimination and the demeaning of any religion; and

Whereas the Ayatollah's death threats against Salman Rushdie and others associated with his book jeopardize Iran's standing in the international community and are a serious impediment to improved relations between the United States and Iran: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives—

(1) condemns the death threats issued by the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini against Salman Rushdie and others associated with the publication and distribution of his book The Satanic Verses;

(2) condemns as incitement to terrorism by a state the threats of the Government of Iran and the Ayatollah Khomeini to assassinate citizens of other countries on foreign soil;

(3) calls for the repudiation of such threats and the immediate withdrawal of any monetary reward or martyrdom for the murder of Salman Rushdie;

(4) commends the United Kingdom and other European community member states for withdrawing their chiefs of diplomatic mission from Iran in response to the Ayatollah Khomeini's death threats;

(5) commends all those authors, publishers, and other persons who have reaffirmed the internationally recognized right to freedom of expression by supporting Salman Rushdie's rights despite threats and intimidation;

(6) applauds President George Bush for his statement of outrage against the Iranian Government's actions and calls upon the President to condemn publicly any threats made against the author and other persons associated with the book The Satanic Verses;

(7) declares the commitment of the United States Government to the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of expression, including the right of any person to write, publish, sell, buy, read, and disseminate books and information without fear of intimidation and violence; and

(8) asks that the President direct Federal agencies to cooperate fully with State and local law enforcement authorities to provide protection against threats to establishments, including bookstores, that may wish to display and distribute Salman Rushdie's novel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS].

□ 1400

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks we had one of the most outrageous and most preposterous statements ever uttered by the leader of a country. The Ayatollah ordered that an author be executed for his writings.

An open invitation to murder is a hostile act and a flagrant violation of internationally accepted rules of behavior, and contrary to any civilized conduct and the charter of the United Nations. I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, that in dealing with this resolution those of us who support the resolution make it clear that we have the highest regard for all religions, and the issue indeed is not one of religion. It is the right of people to express themselves freely, without intimidation and without threats of death.

The entire civilized world was outraged at this preposterous call for assassination on the part of the Ayatollah. The European community withdrew its ambassadors from Iran and civilized people throughout the globe, Christians, Jews, Moslems, and others denounced the Ayatollah for this preposterous outrage of calling for assassination for the right of free speech and free expression.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, for the Congress of the United States to stand up and be counted. One of the most fundamental and cherished principles of our society is free speech, and we simply cannot tolerate the attempt to suppress the freedom of speech of anyone by the dictatorial ruler of Iran.

We condemn the death threats issued by the Ayatollah against Salman Rushdie and we condemn the incitement to terrorism by a state: the government of Iran. The Ayatollah has called on all people to rise and assassinate not only the author of this book, but all others who had anything to do with the publication of this book.

We commend our European friends and others who stood with us in defending the right of free speech and free expression. We commend all those authors and publishers and others who reaffirmed the internationally recognized right to freedom of expression by supporting Mr. Salman Rushdie's right, despite threats and intimidation.

We declare that the commitment of the United States to the promotion and protection of the right to freedom of expression is unqualified, and we ask the President of the United States to direct all Federal agencies to cooperate fully with State and local enforcement authorities to provide protection against threats to establishments, including book stores, that may wish to display or to distribute Salman Rushdie's novel.

We think that the Ayatollah's preposterous statements hit a new low in international affairs.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly support this resolution condemning Ayatollah Khomeini's recent death threats against British author Salman Rushdie. I commend Congressmen MILLER and LEVINE for this timely legislative initiative.

Both President Bush and the Secretary of State have made strong statements of outrage against the Iranian Government's latest lunacy. The House of Representatives should add its voice to all of those which have spoken out against international terrorism and infringement of free speech.

Now is the time to take a stand. It is time to face down the bully from Tehran and defend freedom in the face of fanaticism.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution.

America must stand its ground in the face of this brazen assault on freedom and reason. In the past, totalitarian states have denied others the right to speak and write freely. Totalitarians have had a great deal of success in imposing their ideologies because they made sure that no voices could be raised in opposition.

After a long series of terrorist attacks on Americans over the years, the Ayatollah has launched his latest terrorist offensive, an attack on the internationally recognized freedom of expression. A death threat has been made against a man who exercised his freedom to write a book. While all of us should respect the religions of others, only a terrorist-supporting nation would stoop to assassination.

Attempts to censor Mr. Rushdie's book are an attack on all of us. Death threats on Mr. Rushdie threaten the spirit of freedom and undermine our civilization.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ].

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this resolution. I want to pay tribute to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] who authored the resolution for responding with such great alacrity to this fundamental threat to our most basic values as a nation.

Whatever one may think of Salman Rushdie, and having read some of his previous books I have to say that he is not my favorite author, whatever one may think of the "Satanic Verses," the notion that someone can be threatened with death for what they write, the notion that American publishers and booksellers can be threatened with death for facilitating the distribution of a book is something which is totally, utterly and completely incompatible with our most fundamental values as a nation.

I think it is very important for the House of Representatives to say to the Ayatollah Khomeini and to anyone who subscribes to his many evil conceptions of how to deal with the expression of freedom of thought that we will not accept these threats and we will not tolerate them.

Mr. Speaker, on Sunday the New York Times in its book review section solicited the thoughts of about two dozen writers of renown from all over the world who shared the concerns embodied in this resolution. I wanted to just bring to the attention of my colleagues the selection which appeared in the New York Times book review that was submitted by Adam Michnik, a dissident and author from Poland, who has himself authored some of the most moving and powerful polemics in behalf of freedom and democracy that have been written in the history of our time. Here is what Adam Michnik wrote about this threat by the Ayatollah:

I am deeply distressed that once again a time has returned when it's possible publicly to call for murder. My distress is all the greater because the designated victim of the murder is a writer. A world in which a fanatic governing Iran can rent paid murderers all over the globe is a world in which no one is safe. Salman Rushdie was condemned to death and that's why it's every person's duty to give him shelter. We need to be on the side of the writer and against those who want to murder him. I'd like Salman Rushdie to know that my house is his house.

Mr. Speaker, by adopting this resolution today we say to Salman Rushdie our house is his house and that we will do everthing we can as a nation to protect him and those associated with the publication and distribution of his book from these mad and monstrous threats by the fulminating fanatic fundamentalists in Iran.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of House Resolution 102, expressing the condemnation by the House of the Ayatollah Khomeini's death threats against Salman Rushdie, the author of the novel "Satanic Verses," and others associated with the book.

I want to commend the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ] for joining together in sponsoring this resolution.

These Iranian death threats are outrageous. They have shocked the entire world.

It is incumbent, therefore, that all of us and all nations who deeply believe in the freedom of expression stand up and declare our indignation for these repugnant acts by the Iranian Government.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to fully support the resolution.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. LOWEY].

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Resolution 102 condemning the death threats which have been made against Salman Rushdie and others involved in the publication and marketing of his book, "Satanic Verses." I feel as deeply about my religion as anyone possibly could, so I can understand the anger that followers of Islam might feel about the book.

But the response promoted by the Ayatollah Khomeini is irrational and is encouraging acts of terrorism around the world. The terrorism has struck right here in our country, and we must act boldly to bring an end to it. Innocent people have lost their lives and have seen their livelihoods destroyed as a result of the Ayatol-lah's death threats. I heard from one of my own constituents whose family has suffered wrongfully from all of this. That constituent has a relative who owns a bookstore which was selling Mr. Rushdie's book. The store was firebombed causing extreme damage. My colleagues, that firebombing was terrorism, nothing less.

In reviewing House Resolution 102, I was particularly pleased to note the direction to Federal agencies to assist in providing protection for bookstores distributing this book. We have a circumstance here which clearly warrants those kinds of protections here at home coupled with very strong condemnations of these barbaric threats abroad.

I appreciate the leadership's prompt action in moving this resolution to the floor, and I urge all of my colleagues to lend it their strong support.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FASCELL. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to commend the gentlewoman from New York for her excellent statement and her contribution to this matter. It is a very serious matter on which the Congress must speak out.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman from New York has done it most eloquently.

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. I thank the chairman.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS].

Mr. DONALD E. "BUZ" LUKENS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in very, very strong support of this House Resolution 102.

I would like to add my voice to those commending Congressman MILLER of California for his rapid introduction of House Resolution 102 on this topic.

Mr. Speaker, I hesitate only because I do not wish to align myself with Mr. Rushdie, having read at least some of the excerpts of the book in question, "Satanic Verses," and find myself somewhat repelled, and certainly intellectually turned off by the approach in his book to the religion of Islam.

By the same token, I do think there is no doubt that this body must hasten, and this country's leaders must hasten to take the strongest possible exception to the first issuance of government assassination out of Iran since the days of Hitler and Nazi Germany.

While I do not agree with Mr. Rushdie's basic philosophy as well as I know it, as excerpted form his book, his right, his absolute right, particularly in this country, but it should be true throughout the world, to make his feelings known anyway he likes, are absolute and should be protected at all costs.

I am really dismayed at the emotionalism and fanaticism displayed by the leader of Iran at a time when his people are dying and starving and need as much assistance as possible from the rest of the world.

It would seem to me that while religion is the most important thing in the lives of most of us in God-fearing countries, you must also consider the right of a person to stand up and disagree with the Government on almost any issue.

Throughout the world, human rights organizations rate different countries on their relative strengths and lack of strength in the area of protecting the rights of human beings to survive, exist, and prosper. I find it extremely dismaying that Mr. Khomeini has thrown his lot in with the extreme Islamic fanatics on this particular issue.

Mr. Rushdie's right to publish and speak out on whatever topic he chooses is one which was argued in the Committee on Foreign Affairs today; it may not be sacred but it is certainly hallowed; whatever that distinction may be. We should protect it with every means at our physical, spiritual, and political disposal.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the principal sponsor of this resolution, the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] for his attention to this resolution and also to the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] for the attention he has given to moving this to the floor, and for the cooperation of the leadership.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 102 is a strong statement by this Congress in defense of the human right to free speech.

The death threats against Salman Rushdie, and others associated with the sale of his book, are a direct attack against this most basic right, and we condemn those threats.

The freedom to write, read, publish, and sell books free of fear and intimidation must not be infringed.

This resolution is in defense of the ability of the people, not the state, to decide the merits of an author's work.

We acknowledge that this book has offended many Moslems, and in no way do we condone the demeaning of anyone's religious beliefs.

There have been many books written and published that cause offense to many people. We do not condone those books. We do not condone those beliefs.

But however disagreeable those opinions may be, the use of violence, or the use of state authority, to deny the freedom of expression is a far worse offense.

In passing this resolution today, the House joins many other nations that have stood up in defense of free speech. I also commend our colleagues in the Senate for having passed a similar resolution.

We also applaud President Bush for denouncing the death threat against Mr. Rushdie, as well as the members of the European Community for their actions taken against Iran in response to the threats.

The Congress also commends the writers and writers' organizations that have devoted their time to defend Salman Rushdie and the right of free speech.

This is not only a theoretical debate. There have already been three acts of violence that, in all probability, were linked to the sale of Mr. Rushdie's book—the bombings of book stores in Berkeley, CA and a newspaper in the Bronx.

The Ayatollah Khomeini must understand that the danger presented by his death threat is far greater than the danger Rushdie's novel poses to Islam.

I call for unanimous vote in support of House Resolution 102, and in support of freedom of expression and freedom of the press.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 102, as amended, concerning the death threats issued by the Ayatollah Khomeini of Iran against British author Salman Rushdie and urge its immediate adoption.

The resolution was unanimously approved by the Committee on Foreign Affairs this morning. The committee also approved amendments that had been agreed upon by the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East during its consideration of the legislation. The Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, to whom this legislation had also been referred, agreed to waive consideration in order that we might expedite its consideration before the full House. I want to commend the distinguished chairmen and ranking minority members of the two subcommittees, Messrs. HAMILTON, GILMAN, YATRON, and BEREUTER, for their leadership on this important issue.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to commend the author of House Resolution 102, Mr. MILLER of California, for taking the lead in bringing to the attention of the House the deplorable threats against Mr. Rushdie and the attacks on the internationally recognized right to freedom of expression that these death threats constitute. House Resolution 102 provides this body with the opportunity to express its condemnation of the actions of Ayatollah Khomeini and others and to defend the fundamental principle of freedom of expression that we in the United States hold so dear. I am pleased to note that this important resolution has received broad bipartisan support.

Support for freedom of expression is one of the basic principles on which this Nation is founded. It is embodied in the Bill of Rights of the Constitution. Furthermore, this freedom is recognized by the international community in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which Iran is a party. House Resolution 102 cites the text of the International Covenant which explicitly guarantees to everyone "the right to freedom of expression, including the freedom to seek, receive, and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media." The Ayatollah's attempts to exercise censorship by death threat are blatant violations of this internationally recognized human right.

The threat against British author Salman Rushdie has not only violated the rights and seriously restricted the freedom of Mr. Rushdie and his wife, American author Marianne Wiggins, but it has seriously jeopardized the rights of all Americans to exercise their fundamental right to receive information. The threats against Mr. Rushdie's publishers and others associated with the distribution and dissemination of the book "Satanic Verses" has resulted in an atmosphere of fear and intimidation which must not be tolerated.

While we in the United States respect religious diversity and deplore religious intolerance and discrimination, we cannot allow respect for freedom of religion to impede the exercise of freedom of expression. While I understand and appreciate that Mr. Rushdie's novel, which I have not read, may offend members of the Islamic faith, we must vigorously defend his right to write and publish his views, regardless of whether or not we agree with him. Incitement to violence under the guise of defense of religious freedom must never be accepted or condoned. UNESCO's Director General Federico Mayor, expressed the sentiment of many when he said, "It is every person's duty to respect other people's religions; it is also every person's duty to respect other people's freedom of expression. Whatever the offense may be, no incitement to violence from whatever source, is admissible."

It is gratifying to see that the world community has rallied to defend these cherished freedoms. The principle of artistic freedom has been defended by authors, publishers, and others in the art world. The right to freedom of expression for all has been championed by journalists, human rights activists, and others. And world leaders have condemned what amounts to state-sponsored terrorism against Mr. Rushdie and all those connected with his book.

This is not the first time we have faced serious threats or actions from Iran or other states which support international terrorism. It will not be the last. However, what we need to do, and what we are doing, is to apply longstanding principles and tactics developed to deal with the threats of international terrorism. These include firmness in the face of attempted intimidation, and a measured response which should be coordinated with our friends and allies in order to have an effective and realistic result.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 102 provides an excellent opportunity for the House of Representatives to go on record deploring this vicious assault on liberty and in defense of freedom. I urge its unanimous and immediate adoption.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, in a single barbarous pronouncement, the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran has appeared to set civilization back a century or two. By declaring a death sentence on an author—Salman Rushdie for his book, "Satanic Verses"—this religious zealot has tried to sweep away centuries of principled behavior that are essential if there is to be civilized discourse in the societies of the world, and if there is to be true freedom of expression for mankind.

So outrageous was his act, so extreme, so uncivilized that reaction was slow to come—almost as though many could not believe that he had really done what, in fact, he had done quite emphatically. Authors, book sellers, government leaders and spokesmen of other institutions seemed too stunned to react strongly. I tend to find that forgivable. It is perhaps even laudable that we find such unthinkable acts unbelievable.

But time has passed. We now know and understand the implications of the Ayatollah's audacity. We now must believe it. And we must denounce it in the strongest possible terms. At this time I call on all my esteemed colleagues to offer their full support for House Resolution 102. The Ayatollah's actions represent the antithesis of principles by which human beings can live and work together peacefully, even while having profound differences of philosophy, outlook, and culture. To pass a death sentence on those who offend us is merely barbarous. The Ayatollah is profoundly offensive to my view of freedom, humanity and civilization, but I would be appalled at a call for his death, let alone an invitation to commit the murder.

The Ayatollah will, I suspect, never understand that. I hope his followers will grow to understand it, just as I hope the rest of the world does not let his actions establish a new, lower standard of behavior for responsible leaders the world around.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIN). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, House Resolution 102, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 102, the resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY: A NATIONAL DAY OF CELEBRATION OF GREEK AND AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 64) to designate March 25, 1989, as "Greek Independence Day: National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy" and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 145, "Greek Independence Day: A Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy."

I am proud to be a cosponsor of this resolution. It was the ancient Greeks who forged the ideals of democracy from which our Founding Fathers drew when they shaped the principles of government for our great Nation. For that we owe a great debt to the ancient Greeks.

Modern Greeks turned their eyes to the United States as the standard to follow when they sought release from Ottoman rule. March 25, 1989 marks the 168th anniversary of their independence and birth of a new era for the distinguished nation of Greece.

Because the concept of democracy was born in the age of the ancient Greeks, all Americans, whether or not they are of Greek ancestry, are kinsmen of a kind to the Greeks. The common heritage we share has forged a close bond between Greece and the United States, and between our peoples. It is reflected in the numerous contributions made by present day Greek Americans, across the country, to our American cultures.

Today, let us celebrate, with the Greek people, a common heritage of freedom and democracy that both our nations share. By proclaiming March 25, 1989, as Greek Independence Day, we will be reaffirming our strong allegiance to the principles of freedom and democracy.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. RIDGE. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS].

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and very proud to have an opportunity to stand before you today as we pass this resolution. I would also like to thank Chairman FORD of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service—who is, by the way, a cosponsor of the resolution—Chairman SAWYER of the Subcommittee on Census and Population, and Mr. RIDGE, ranking member of the Subcommittee on Census and Population, for their support and assistance in bringing this resolution to the floor.

I am, additionally, grateful to my colleagues, Congressman ROY DYSON and Congressman STEVE NEAL, who were original cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 145 with me as well as the 130 House colleagues who cosponsored my bill. Last, but certainly not least, Mr. Speaker, I thank Senator LAUTENBERG, whose resolution we are bringing up today, for his initiative and his hard work.

Mr. Speaker, as you well know, a similar resolution has been signed into law for the past 2 years. I am most pleased and encouraged that passage of this resolution—like the annual special order which I take out to commemorate Greek Independence Day—is becoming an annual custom. While resolutions come and resolutions go, "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy" seems to have caught on and I think it only proper and fitting.

Mr. Speaker, while I fully realize that current political issues may oftentimes cause tensions between our country and Greece, the fact remains that we have been loyal allies who share many bonds that must continually be brought to light so that they may serve as an incentive for the continuation of good relations between these two historic friends.

March 25 is a day of celebration for those of the Greek heritage and Greek Orthodox faith. Almost greater than any other day of the year in their religious faith and national history, March 25 commemorates the beginning of the Greek struggle for independence from over 400 years of Ottoman domination.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was on March 25, 1821, that the so-called Greek resistance, small, battle-weary groups of guerrillas known as Klephtes, embarked on their long and just struggle for freedom against the mighty Ottoman Empire.

They may have been outnumbered, they may have been outsupplied, but the brave Greek patriots held a deep conviction and dream from within their hearts for liberty and justice.

Their struggle for freedom soon gained international support and respect and, after a ferocious 6-year struggle, the indomitable Greek will realized its long-awaited goal—freedom—after over 400 years under the yoke of the Ottoman Empire.

I always am amazed, too, Mr. Speaker, that during that entire 400 years of rule by others of different religions, culture, and nationality—the Greeks retained their language, religion, and heritage.

Mr. Speaker, I think it important that we, as Americans, help to celebrate Greek Independence Day, for our republic and its citizens have received an important legacy from the Greeks—a legacy that serves as the foundation for the very responsibilities we pursue as legislators.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that each time we perform our constitutional duty, we are doing so in the legacy of the ancient Greeks, for the United States Constitution, the basis for our very system of government, has a rich classical ancestry.

As we all know, in the American colonial period, during the formative years of the American experiment, no feature was more prominent than the extent to which Greek and Roman sources were cited by the Framers of the Constitution. Indeed, the basis for our Constitution itself, derived from Aristotle, was put into practice in 18th century England and in the early state constitutions, before it was given its embodiment by the Convention of 1787.

The overriding appreciation, of course, was for Aristotle's sense of balance, since the delegates viewed the tyrant and the mob as equally dangerous. In fact, both Madison and John Adams emphasized what Aristotle wrote in the Politics. I quote from that treatise, "The more perfect the admixture of the political elements, the more lasting will be the state."

When we honor our Constitution, therefore, Mr. Speaker, we also celebrate the example of the ancient Greeks.

In addition to these contributions, however, passage of the resolution before us today also celebrates the return of democracy to Greece and reminds us of the promise of democracy to people in Nicaragua, parts of Africa, and other parts of the world who are, at this very moment, fighting for that which we, unfortunately, tend to take for granted.

This day of glory that the Greek people rejoice in, helps us too, as a nation, to rejoice in the soul and spirit of 1776, a spirit that "never says die."—A spirit that today lives on in defense of the principles for which so many of the free world's citizens have given their lives.

These principles are embodied in the slogan "Eleftheria I Thanatos"—"Liberty or Death." They are not uniquely Greek, Mr. Speaker but they are a legacy which all democracies cherish and have a responsibility to protect.

Again, my deep gratitude to all who made passage of "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy" a reality this year.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAWYER].

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my support for Senate Joint Resolution 64, designating March 25, 1989, as "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy."

March 25, 1989, marks the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the struggle which resulted in the freedom of the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire.

I am pleased to participate in the effort to continue this annual celebration.

This is an appropriate way for us to observe and commemorate the rich history shared by the United States and Greece.

It is undisputed that ancient Greece was the origin of a significant set of political and philosophical principles from which our Founding Fathers borrowed heavily in forming our representative democracy.

At the same time, it was our revolutionary experience and Declaration of Independence which were part of the ideals supporting Greece's fight for freedom.

Since those pioneering years, our two countries have come to enjoy close, friendly relations, which is evident in world affairs and the growth of a Greek-American community in this country.

We find in every walk of life Greek-Americans making invaluable contributions to the maintenance of and advancement of our own society. All of us who share in the common bond of the understanding that we as a nation are bound together, not so much by common blood but by common belief, have reason to celebrate this very special independence day this month, because to the degree that we are all bound by that common faith in the rule of law, we are all Greek-Americans in one sense or another.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS], who is the sponsor of the House companion measure, for providing us with an opportunity to display the appreciation that we all share for the longstanding relationship between the United States and Greece.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to mark the 168th anniversary of Greek independence.

On March 25, 1821, Greek patriots opened their long battle to regain their nation's freedom. In declaring their independence from the Ottoman Empire, they restated an ancient Greek ideals: Every nation, everywhere, at evey time, has the right to choose its own leaders, and to live in freedom and peace. And very soon, lovers of freedom from all over Europe and from these United States joined them in their fight.

The Greek freedom fighters and their allies set the world an example in bravery; but their struggle was neither quickly ended nor easily won. Greek families lost lives and shed tears. The citizens of ancient and treasured regions of Greece—Salonika, Crete, Rhodes—waited decades to join their brothers and sisters.

But Greek courage and sacrifice brought victory to their cause and freedom to their country. And the knowledge that the Greek flag flies over Athens was a wonder to the world then, and reminds us now that the poetry of Homer and Hesiod, the philosophy of Plato and Artistotle, the science of Archimedes and Euclid, were just the first of the Greek nation's contributions to our world.

Since 1821, our two countries have maintained a unique friendship. In peace and war, we recognize our common interest and defend our common values. We fought together against the Nazis in the Second World War, and stand together for freedom in the NATO alliance. Our friendship is based not on political advantage, but on our mutual belief in democratic government and the individual's right to freedom. It is a friendship tha can last forever.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud Congressmen BILIRAKIS, NEAL, and DYSON for introducing their commemorative resolution. It is a pleasure to join millions of Greeks, Greek-Americans, and lovers of freedom around the world in celebrating this day. Let us trust and pray that the next anniversary of Greek independence will be just as joyful.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commemorate "Greek Independence Day," March 25, 1989. This marks the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire—a domination that lasted for almost 400 years.

As the poet Percy Bysshe Shelly noted, "Our laws, our literature, our religion, our art, have their roots in Greece." The American form of democracy, the basic principles of our Constitution, the revolutionary concept that "everyone is equal before the law," all originated in the Greek experiment with self-government some 2,000 years ago.

In return, the American revolution became one of the ideals of the Greeks as they fought for their own independence in the 1820's. Greek patriots translated the United States Declaration of Independence and used it as their own when they broke away from the Ottoman Empire. Many volunteers from all across America participated in Greece's war for independence.

During recent history, the United States and Greece have maintained close ties. In the early 1900's, large numbers of Greek natives immigrated to America, and during World War II over 600,000 Greeks died fighting on the side of the allies—a loss that represents 9 percent of their entire population. Americans of Greek ancestry have thrived in this country and have made major contributions to science, religion, music, art, and public serivce. Last year, the Democratic Party chose a proud American of Greek ancestry, Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis, as their nominee for President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, both our nations have given much to each other. It is fitting that we mark March 25 as a national day of celebration of Greek and American democracy.

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, "Greek civilization is alive; it moves in every breath of mind that we breath; so much of it remains that none of us is one lifetime could absorb it all. Greece is the bright morning star of that Western civilization which is our nourishment and life."

These words of the noted historian Will Durant express the heartfelt sentiment that America and the free world hold for their great ancestor of democracy—Greece.

March 25, 1989, marks the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire. In 1821, Greece declared her independnce from almost 400 years of Turkish occupation. During that time, the people were deprived of all civil rights; schools and churches were closed down; and Christian and Jewish boys were kidnapped and raised as Moslems to serve the Sultan. But their unconquerable spirit finally prevailed. Greece recaptured her birthright—democracy.

Democracy itself is a Greek word—"demo" meaning people and "kras" rule or government thus "rule by the people." From the days 2,000 years ago when Pericles spoke of democratic freedom up through today the tenants of individual dignity and the rights afforded by rule of law have given hope to millions of people around the globe. Nowhere are these democratic principles better represented than in the United States today.

And while Greece has provided America with the philosophical foundation for its great experiment in democratic government, America in turn acted as the role model for Greek independence, as she adopted our Constitution as her own. That symbiotic union is still alive today and so it is fitting that we honor our Greek-Americans for their contributions to this country.

Through their remarkable compatibility with the people of America, Greeks have become very successful in the United States. According to U.S. census data, the first Greeks who became U.S. citizens ranked only 18th of the 24 nationalities in their median educational attainment. Their children, however, had leapt to the top by 1970 to rank number one among the American ethnic nationalities.

Of course, I am proud to be a Greek-American and proud of the Greek achievements in the United States.

But I am even prouder of the great heritage of freedom which our ancestors gave to the world so many years ago. Although the struggle for democracy continues in many parts of the world, the Greek spirit will prevail.

That is what this day is all about.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to commemorate, on March 25, 1989, Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy.

This Saturday will mark the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire. Greece was under the control of the Ottoman Empire for almost 400 years, from the fall of Constantinople in 1453 until its declaration of independence in 1821. Greek intellectuals translated the United States Declaration of Independence and used it for their own declaration.

Greece has the distinguished honor of being the birthplace of what we today consider democracy. As James Madison and Alexander Hamilton wrote in the 1787-88 Federalist Papers, "Among the confederates of antiquity the most considerable was that of the Grecian Republic * * * From the best accounts transmitted of this celebrated institution it bore a very instructive analogy to the present confederation of the American States."

The Greek-American relationship has been a mutual one. We derived our ideas of democracy from their ideology and they were guided by our revolution and Declaration of Independence for their own freedom. The Greeks have stood along side the United States in the fight for democracy around the world. Over 600,000 Greeks, 9 percent of their entire population, died fighting on the side of the Allies in the Second World War.

Our Greek-Americans in this country have continually made worthy contributions to our American melting pot. Some Greek-Americans of national note include: in medicine, Dr. George Kotzias who developed a drug to combat Parkinson's disease; in music, Maria Callas; in acting, Telly Savalas, and Olympia Dukakis, and in government, Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis, San Francisco Mayor Art Agnos, and many others.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all of us here today to honor the Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy.

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to all Greek-Americans across the United States as March 25, 1989, marks the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire.

It is important to set aside a day to honor Greek-Americans with a national day of celebration of Greek and American democracy. For it was the Greek independence which resulted in the democratic foundation that future countries would adopt, and it is of this foundation that American democracy has flourished. In assessing the significance of the Greek independence to American democratic ideals, James Madison and Alexander Hamilton wrote:

Among the confederacies of antiquity the most considerable was that of the Grecian republics. * * * From the best accounts transmitted of this celebrated institution it bore a very instructive analogy to the present confederation of the American states.

In turn, the United States has also contributed as a role model for Greek independence. The American Revolution became one of the ideals of the Greeks as they fought for independence in the 1820's. Greek intellectuals translated the Declaration of Independence of the United States and use it as their own declaration. As a Greek commander in chief once said in appealing to the citizens of the United States:

Having formed the resolution to live or die for freedom, we are drawn toward you by just sympathy since it is in your land that liberty has fixed her abode, and by you that she is prized as by our fathers. Hence, honoring her name, we invoke yours at the same time, trusting that in imitating you, we shall imitate our ancestors and by thought worthy of them if we succeed in resembling you * * * it is for you, citizens of America, to crown this glory.

Mr. Speaker, it is because of this common bond of democratic ideals, that I ask my fellow colleagues to join me in saluting the Greek nation as they celebrate their independence and recognize the many contributions of the Greek-American community to our Nation's advancement.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, Greek-Americans have made great contributions to this country and it is with pleasure that I make these remarks in commemoration of March 25, 1989, as Greek Independence Day—a national day of celebration of Greek and American democracy. March 25 marks the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the Greek fight for democracy and independence from the Ottoman Empire which began in 1821.

The Greek struggle for independence was inspired, in part, by the American achievement of independence and democracy which, in turn, was inspired by the model of democracy in Ancient Greece. As James Madison and Alexander Hamilton wrote in the Federalist Papers, "Among the confederacies of antiquity the most considerable was that of the Grecian republics * * *. From the best accounts transmitted to this celebrated institution it bore a very instructive analogy to the present confederation of American States."

Even before large numbers of Greeks immigrated to this country in the beginning of the 20th century, they had a profound impact on our Nation. They have continued to make contributions to their new country. I am proud to honor these Americans with this day.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 64

Whereas the ancient Greeks developed the concept of democracy, in which the supreme power to govern was vested in the people;

Whereas the Founding Fathers of the United States of America drew heavily upon the political and philosophical experience of ancient Greece in forming our representative democracy;

Whereas March 25, 1989, marks the one hundred and sixty-eighth anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire;

Whereas these and other ideals have forged a close bond between our two nations and their peoples; and

Whereas it is proper and desirable to celebrate with the Greek people, and to reaffirm the democratic principles from which our two great nations sprang: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 25, 1989, is designated as "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy", and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL AGRICULTURE DAY

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 117) to proclaim March 20, 1989, as "National Agriculture Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

□ 1430

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to publicly acknowledge the work of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 117, to proclaim March 20, 1989, as "National Agriculture Day," and I tell him and advise my colleagues on the other side of the aisle that I am pleased to join with him in this recognition.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of House Joint Resolution 117, to designate March 20, 1989, as "National Agriculture Day."

I introduced this resolution with the Honorable EDWARD R. MADIGAN, the distinguished ranking minority member of the House Committee on Agriculture, to encourage all Americans to be aware of the importance of agriculture in every aspect of their lives.

This observance, which has been in effect for more than a decade, is traditionally celebrated on the first day of spring, a season of rebirth and growth after the chilly days of winter. This year, especially, it is a time of new promise and hope for America's agriculture sector after the devastating drought of last year.

Working together with the Agriculture Council of America, we have sought to educate all Americans about the men and women who have dedicated their lives to provide the food and fiber necessary for human existence, and who have helped spur the economic growth of our great Nation.

Agriculture and the food and fiber system represents 17 percent of our Nation's gross national product. One out of every six jobs is in agriculture and related industry. The food and fiber system generates an estimated 20.1 million jobs, approximately 17 percent of the entire U.S. workforce. Approximately 90 percent of the jobs in today's food and fiber system are off-the-farm jobs.

The American agricultural sector is the most efficient and productive in the world. The American food and fiber system produces 27 percent of the world's food grains and 25 percent of the world's beef with only 3 percent of the world's agricultural labor force. One farmer or rancher can provide food and fiber for 114 people, 92 in the United States and 22 in foreign lands.

The United States is the world's largest exporting nation of agricultural products. In fiscal 1988, U.S. agricultural exports were $35.5 billion with agricultural imports totaling only $21 billion. This $14.5 billion favorable balance of trade offset some of the large unfavorable balance in U.S. industrial trade. Further, each additional $1 billion in U.S. farm exports creates another $1.5 billion of economic activity. The eight largest markets for United States agricultural exports in 1987—in millions of dollars—were Japan, $5,700; Netherlands, $1,975; South Korea, $1,833; Canada, $1,809; Taiwan, $1,285; West Germany, $1,284; Mexico, $1,200; and the Soviet Union, $938.

Furthermore, Americans spend a lower percentage of their disposable income on food than the citizens of any other nation in the world. On average, an American will spend only 13 percent of disposable income on food, compares with Japan at 18 percent, Philippines at 53 percent, France at 18 percent, and Ecuador at 35 percent.

Less than 1 percent of U.S. farmland is foreign-owned. The largest among foreign-owned acreage, 14 percent of the U.S. total, is in Maine and is mostly timberland.

In 1987, one in 49 persons, or 2 percent of the U.S. population, lived on a farm, compared with 30 percent in 1920, and 90 percent when the Constitution was signed. The rural farm population dropped about 1 million between 1890 and 1984 to 4,986,000.

Like other independent businesses, many U.S. farms are incorporated. Of all incorporated farms, 82 percent were family-held in 1982.

The average farm is 463 acres with average farm assets at $373,7000—including real estate and operator household. Average farm debt is $70,500. Farmers that have off-farm jobs in addition to farming represent 48.4 percent of the farm population. Farm residents' medium age was 37.6 years, compared with 32 years for nonfarm residents.

There was a total 998,692,000 acres in farm land in 1988 with 25.5 million acres enrolled in the Convervation Reserve program and 54.2 million acres in setaside programs.

The proclamation of this observance, which has bipartisan support in both Houses of this Congress and the full support of the executive branch, has always been a useful way of adding to the importance and prominence of National Agriculture Day. It helps to promote an understanding of modern agriculture, culturally and historically, as a way of life.

I urge my colleagues in the House to pass this resolution as a show of support for America's farmers, ranchers and all other Americans employed in the food and fiber system, and as a declaration of faith in agriculture's importance to America's health and well-being.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1989, Agriculture Committee Chairman KIKA DE LA GARZA introduced House Joint Resolution 117 recognizing March 20, the first day of spring, as National Agriculture Day. I applaud this action and wish to remind my colleagues of the significant importance of our Nation's agriculture industry.

Established in 1973, National Agriculture Day has been designed to promote better understanding between agriculture related groups and the urban public, and to promote a broader national understanding of the vital role agriculture plays in the welfare of all Americans.

America's farmers provide food and fiber for millions around the world and jobs for nearly 25 million workers in the United States. Today the output of one farmer feeds over 116 people, including 30 people in other countries. With less than 2 percent of our Nation's population engaged in farming this level of output is staggering. About one-fifth of all agricultural goods in world trade originate on American farms. Even with last year's summer drought affecting much of our Nation's heartland, agricultural trade continued to provide significant revenues to our Nation's GNP.

Every $1 billion of farm commodities exported creates 30,000 jobs. But what farmers purchase to produce their commodities also creates employment for other Americans. According to statistics published recently by a national farm organization, farmers use 6.5 million tons of steel annually requiring the efforts of 40,000 workers. Internationally the United States ranks the lowest in percentage of annual income spent on food because of our country's efficient agriculture production.

An annual increase in farm production has come to be taken for granted but in the early decades of this century farm production was almost on a treadmill. Agricultural production in the United States rose nearly 1 percent per year from 1910 to 1930. It rose an average of 1.5 percent annually in the 1930's, 2 percent in the 1940's, 2.2 percent in the 1950's, 1 percent in the 1960's; from 1970 to the record production levels realized in the 1980's it has averaged an annual increase of nearly 3 percent, according to USDA statistics.

An ever increasing level of production does not come by accident. Agriculture research and education play an important role in the vitality of farm output. 4–H, Future Farmers of America, and other agriculture youth groups contribute greatly to the ability of agricultural industry to meet the challenges of the future. Through these organizations young people are being prepared for over 200 different careers related to agriculture. We must not lose sight of agricultural education's importance if American agriculture is to continue prospering.

I call upon all segments of the agriculture industry—from the farm to the supermarket checkout counter, from those who grow and harvest our crops to the men and women who process them into food and clothing, from those who furnish farm production supplies to those who transport our commodities to hundreds of millions of people in this country and around the world to join in the celebrations and observances planned in communities across the country on Agriculture Day, March 20, 1989.

Mr. RIDGE. I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 117

Whereas agriculture is the Nation's largest and most basic industry, and its associated production, processing, and marketing segments together provide more jobs than any other single industry;

Whereas agriculture serves all Americans by providing food, fiber, and other basic necessities of life;

Whereas the performance of the agricultural economy is vital to maintaining the strength of our national economy, the standard of living of our citizens, and our presence in world trade markets;

Whereas it is important that all Americans should understand the role that agriculture plays in their lives and well-being whether they live in urban or rural areas; and

Whereas since 1973, the first day of spring has been celebrated as National Agriculture Day by farmers and ranchers, commodity and farm organizations, cooperatives and agribusiness organizations, nonprofit and community organizations, and Federal, State, and local governments: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 20, 1989, is hereby proclaimed "National Agriculture Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this day with appropriate ceremonies and activities during the week of March 19 through March 25, 1989.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION DAY

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 167) to designate March 16, 1989, as "Freedom of Information Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON].

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on behalf of House Joint Resolution 167, which designates March 16, 1989, as "National Freedom of Information Day." As in years past, March 16 has been chosen because it marks the anniversary of the birthday of James Madison, one of America's very earliest advocates of freedom of information.

March 16 is also significant for it was on this date in 1985 that American journalist Terry Anderson was abducted in Beirut by terrorists. Unfortunately, after 4 years, he still remains in the hands of terrorists.

Mr. Speaker, this bill serves as a tribute to Mr. Anderson and to journalists around the world who constantly put their lives in jeopardy while providing us with information.

The first amendment of the Constitution, which guarantees Americans the freedoms of speech and press, is the backbone upon which our great nation is based. We need only to look at the many countries around the world which do not permit freedom of the press to realize how fortunate we are to have this open exchange of ideas.

Mr. Speaker, Arthur Hays Sulzberger once stated that "a man's judgment cannot be better than the information on which he has based it." I wholeheartedly agree with this sentiment and, thus, consider it an honor to speak on behalf of this measure and ask my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution by passing it here today.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 167

Whereas a fundamental principle of our Government is that a well-informed citizenry can reach the important decisions that determine the present and future of the Nation;

Whereas the freedoms we cherish as Americans are fostered by free access to information;

Whereas many Americans, because they have never known any other way of life, take for granted the guarantee of free access to information that derives from the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States;

Whereas the guarantee of free access to information should be emphasized and celebrated annually; and

Whereas March 16 is the anniversary of the birth of James Madison, one of the Founding Fathers, who recognized and supported the need to guarantee individual rights through the Bill of Rights: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 16, 1989, is designated as "Freedom of Information Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal, State, and local government agencies and the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the several joint resolutions just passed.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

INTRODUCTION OF THE TELEVISION VIOLENCE ACT OF 1989

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIN). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, with Mr. FEIGHAN and 34 of my colleagues, the Television Violence Act of 1989. This important legislation would allow the television industry to work collectively to curb the violence in programming seen by children without running afoul of the antitrust laws for a period of 3 years. This bill would not impose regulation on broadcasters, but instead would provide the opportunity for them to discuss voluntary guidelines for cutting down on television violence.

Most scientists studying in this field agree that there is a causal relationship between televised violence and later aggressive behavior in children. If you consider that there are over 50 million viewers under the age of 16 in this country, and that the average child watches over 20 hours of television each week, such a relationship is alarming and deserving of close attention.

There is no question that television violence is pervasive; from Saturday morning cartoons to Friday night "Miami Vice," children are exposed to scenes of graphic violence. Apart from possibly inspiring children to commit violent acts, either as children or later in life, constant exposure to graphic violence desensitizes adults and children to the effect of violence in the real world, and introduces an acceptance of violence as a way to resolve our differences. We may be seeing the long-term effects on children when each morning the Washington Post reports the body count of adolescents and young adults gunned down in the street overnight.

Members of Congress in both Houses have sought legislative solutions to this problem for many years. However, legislative solutions are constrained, fortunately, by the first amendment of the Constitution which protects free speech. We should not and cannot dictate the content of television programming. An obstacle to a voluntary reduction in violence by the networks is that, in this intensely competitive business, it is commonly held that violence sells. Each network is reluctant to take unilateral steps to reduce violent programming for fear of slipping in the ratings. At the same time, our antitrust laws may prohibit these large industrial competitors from meeting to discuss ways to address the issue as an industry.

I believe that the bill we are introducing today addresses the industry's concerns, and more importantly, the concerns of parents for the education and future of their children, without violating the first amendment. Under this bill, the networks are not required to meet, nor to write and disseminate guidelines, nor to implement them. This law would just provide the opportunity to do so. Furthermore, the exemption granted is narrowly drawn so that anticompetitive discussions and agreements would remain subject to the antitrust laws.

In conclusion, this bill address a difficult and insidious problem—the blight on our Nation's children caused by a constant barrage of graphic violence on television. This bill may result in a significant change in the industry's approach to programming content, and it may not. In any event, there is no cost to the American taxpayer. By introducing the bill, I am clearly hopeful that the broadcasters will use this opportunity to address this problem. If not, we will have lost time and some hope, but we would be no worse off than we are today.

LOSING OUR FUTURE IN THE FIELD OF EMERGING TECHNOLOGIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the last few months, we have been treated to a series of television presentations and articles on the growing threat of losing our future to foreign nations in the competition for control of emerging technologies.

In early December, ABC presented an hour long documentary entitled "Losing Our Future," Sander Vanocur's excellent assessment of the weakened condition of our manufacturing-electronics' base. It should have been seen by every American.

Later in the month, Dan Rather featured the selling of America which showed the efforts of some of the Southern States to entice foreign companies—no matter the cost to the taxpayers of the State or to the captive American manufacturers—who will be footing the bill for years to come to give special tax exemptions to foreign interests.

A Time magazine article of January 16, couches the issue in a more strident way—"The Battle for the Future." It says, "Virtually every week seems to bring fresh evidence that Japan is catching up with the United States—and often surpassing it—in creating cutting-edge products that long were the turf of United States firms."

The article then cites statistics showing the United States lags far behind Japan in the total field of electronics—the field which we were assured in the early 1980's would replace the heavy industrial production which we have allowed to be preempted by the dumping of products from foreign nations.

The message being given loud and clear is that we are losing all of the high value added products of the future—while the statistics on steel and machine tools, television sets and radios, ball bearings and foundries prove that we have been decimated in the high value added products of the past.

Mr. Speaker, are you aware that we are the only major industrial nation in the world that is not capable of producing enough steel for its own internal use?

After World War II, there was a notorious plan put forth to render Germany forever powerless as a major nation. It was suggested by then Secretary of Treasury Morganthau and called the Morganthau Plan. It proposed that Germany be stripped of all of its industrial might and be turned into a nation of farmers to assure that Germany would never again be able to make war.

President Harry Truman instead sponsored the Marshall plan, conceived by one of the most famous and honored Secretaries of State to ever serve this Nation—five-star General of the Army George C. Marshall—who understood that deindustrialized nations in Europe would be prey to communism. And that an agrarian Germany would not be able to resist the tide of political change being exported by the Russians.

How little we remember. How little we have learned.

Watching the economic expansionism of Japan—expansionism which we have encouraged with open arms—I have to think about the choices we are making in this country when we choose to export oranges instead of machine tools, wheat instead of steel, base technologies rather than finished products.

We were promised as we traded off our industrial base that electronics and banking—services and agriculture—would be enough to keep us a great nation. Here we are, 20 years after the beginning of that disastrous tradeoff and what do we see:

Electronics moving out of our control—90 percent foreign dependency in some categories. Many of our international banking institutions—those most likely to be involved in exporting services—under threat from the unwise burden of debt to Third World nations during the 1970's and early eighties.

And agriculture—oh for the family farms of 20 years ago which we were supposed to be protecting with our "free trade." All too many of them have vanished in the credit crisis early in this decade. Too many of them now only a memory because they were sacrificed in the same way as were our small companies, our neighborhood machine tool factory, our steel mills.

The one-way free trade, which is the only direction in which free trade has been practiced, turned the family farms into international agribusinesses.

Can we—by design or misadventure—be backing into a national posture where we not only will not be able to make war—no matter how justified, but where we can no longer afford to keep the peace?

Right now, we are borrowing money from Japan to pay for the defense of Japan and the European Community and Latin America—the whole world.

And the reason that we are borrowing money is because we are not saving money. Because we are and have been so profligate with our wonderful resources that we have not only paid the bill to protect the world, we have opened up our markets to invasions by foreign products—all in the name of free trade—producs priced cheaper for export sale to this country than for domestic markets inside the producing countries.

Do you know what that is, Mr. Speaker? That is mercantilism at its most blatant, and among true free traders, it is a dirty word. It is also according to trade law labeled dumping. And dumping on the United States which we choose to ignore. And such market-export actions can be the basis of any numbers of actions under GATT, the General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs.

And Japan is a mercantilist nation—but, our free traders seem to think in their myopic view of Japan—that it is OK for them. Horrible were we to practice it. We would be accused of being protectionists.

They can and have dumped in our markets and no charges are brought by our Government. Individual corporations and associations have brought charges—paying enormous sums to prove their charges—and, in almost every instance—the U.S. Government could have and should have instigated the charges and acted to protect these industries. Except in the case of the microelectronic industry, the Government did not use the power of trade law to act.

And in one case, that of Houdaille Machine Tool—which was not a dumping charge—when a United States court found in favor of the company, the President reversed the court decision down the line at the request of then Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone.

This happened back in 1983. Houdaille Machine Tool is now out of business, and unfortunately a number of our machine tool companies are out of business while we are importing vast amounts from overseas.

But, the mind set over favoring foreign companies unfortunately continues. The voluntary restraint agreements called for by President Reagan in 1986 to protect the machine tool industry against four countries—Japan, Taiwan, Germany, and Switzerland—is not being honored in several categories of machines.

At my request, the General Accounting Office is checking the export figures from these countries—and though they do not anticipate a full report until the summer—preliminary figures show that the Japanese are breaking through the restraints without any effective action taking place in the 1986-87 period.

Hopefully, the situation will show a change when the eighty eight figures are analyzed. Seven other countries were warned of the VRA limitations—the spirit of the voluntary restraint agreements—and again, in the preliminary figures, it seems that they—in several categories—are shipping even more than in previous years.

And thus far, the Commerce Department is doing nothing about it.

I think this kind of sluggish response from our Government is giving away the future. And at the first hearing of the technology transfer task force, we heard about instances involving technology transfer where we—as a nation—are selling the technology off as in the instance of the proposed FSX-16 joint production venture with Japan. Last year it was the joint venture with Japan on building the Aegis antimissile ships.

Interestingly enough, all the while the Japanese have said they will protect these technologies—and we all know that there is a prohibition against Japan producing weapons for sale—Japan is willing to pay twice as much for the ships and the planes if they are allowed to build them than if they brought them off the shelf from us.

Can it be that they just like to spend money? If you believe that, I own the Brooklyn bridge and would like to sell it to you.

In the opinion of both Mr. Richard Perle, former Assistant Secretary of Defense, and Mr. Frank Gaffney, former Chief Arms Negotiator at Defense, the Japanese will be in competition with us for weapons sales in the mid 1990's.

And, if you think they can't change their constitution to go into the arms business, I'm old enough to remember when their constitution had a very strong antitrust clause to keep them from forming business cartels. It was taken out very early on.

You will not be surprised to learn, I am sure, that as we survey the strenght of a Toshiba—with 600 corporations under its umbrella—as we are forced to deal with Japan, Inc.—the first major constitutional change in Japan was to get rid of that antitrust provision. And this Nation did not raise a peep when it happened.

I predict now—the next major change will be to get rid of the prohibition against offensive weapons production. And at the rate we are going—having given them the technology and exported the manufacturing knowhow—we will not raise a peep.

But, that is not all we are shipping off. The Commerce Department—during Christmas week—okayed the construction of a plant inside Russia for the building of a plant to manufacture systems for computer operated continuous manufacturing lines—Bailey's Controls. Interestingly enough, it is this system which is necessary for the building of chemical weapons or nuclear weapons and was developed for the handling—in a safer, more expeditions way—of all manners of toxic substances.

When this plant is finished, not only are the Russians going to be able to manufacture as many controls as they wish for as many plants as the wish, but both Honeywell and Bailey are constructing engineering centers inside Russia to help them adapt and modify the systems and to teach them all they want to know!

Once the deed is done, Russia can sell the controls they produce to anyone of their allies—which includes Iran.

This year we are worrying about Libya having the capabilities to make deadly chemical warfare weapons. What about the Russians having the capabilities or any of their allies? Are we becoming like Scarlett O'Hara? Just supposed to worry about that tomorrow?

We are selling our future, we are coproducing it away, and the business community is passing it up by not being willing to invest in any long term production ventures for new cemmercial products. We are still locked in the mode—invented in America—produced abroad. And it is killing our future.

As an example, Battelle, an American think tank, developed the laminated circuit board. Battelle offered the technology to 13 major American companies. Not one of them was interested in the possibilities. On the other hand, the first Japanese company, Sony, that saw it, wanted it. The circuit technology was the key in the development of the Sony Walkman.

Frequently we hear the expression—"a self-fulfilling prophesy"—and looking at our poor record of preserving our wonderful technologies—I'm afraid this expression may be chillingly accurate about the future of the United States. If we don't have the commitment to invest any longer than 12 or 18 months out—then, beyond that period is there going to be anything American left to invest in?

If we don't protect our wonderful technologies for our children, will they have a choice of jobs or even living standards in their future.

We hear to the point of nausea the expression that "The 21st century belongs to the Pacific Rim." Well, I say "Not if we don't hand it over to them."

It is time to fight for the future of this country—to preserve and protect this country and all of its wonderful opportunties. We were sent to Washington to take care of America. Our constitutional oath is to preserve and protect this Nation—not any others. And, every time we have become more concerned about other nations than we have about our own—we have gotten into trouble.

I hope that many of our colleagues will agree that it is a time to look to our home front—our deficits—our need to create new sources of wealth to help with our burden of debt and in order to do that, it is time to move to protect our technology which represents our future.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

HEALTH CARE AND CHILDREN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be here this afternoon to speak about an issue that is close to my heart, not only as a Member of Congress, but as a mother, and that issue is children.

It is quite a change of pace from my colleague who spoke very eloquently about the economic trials that we are going through as a nation, and I really want to associate myself with many of her remarks. I think she is very much on target; but I think we also have to look at what we are doing in our own country to a group of people without whom we will never go anywhere as a nation and we will never be able to compete as a nation, even if we kept all the technology here, and that is our children.

The House Budget Committee has held a number of hearings, Mr. Speaker, in the last few weeks. It is my privilege to chair the Human Resources Task Force. We had 2 days of hearings in which we looked at health care in this country. We also looked at the condition of children in this country and the status of children in the Bush budget.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, we have come out of a decade of neglect when it comes to our children. Just like anything else, when you neglect something for long enough you begin to understand why we have the problems that we have. Eventually the children come home to roost, and Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that when I start giving you statistics, you will understand what I mean.

Mr. Speaker, over the last 8 years we have seen military spending rise about 100 percent, from about $150 billion to $300 billion, where the domestic side of the budget, particularly the discretionary side, was cut well below inflation. What does that mean? It means that we made a choice, and we are now suffering some of the consequences.

Mr. Speaker, we are losing our children to poverty. One in four children in our Nation suffers from poverty. We are losing our children to drugs, and we have yet to fund adequately the drug program that we passed in the last Congress. We are losing our children from high school. We see the average dropout rate is around 30 percent, and what happens when a child drops out of high school; the options for that child are greatly reduced, and the chances that that child will be on unemployment or underemployed or live in poverty even if he or she has a job is greatly enhanced.

We are losing our children to homelessness, the greatest shame of all, and the changing face of homelessness is evident as we look around the various shelters in the various districts that we represent across this Nation. We never saw the kind of profile that we see today of families and children living in dire straits, many through no fault of their own whatsoever, and even some of them, Mr. Speaker, where the two spouses are actually working, they still cannot make enough to put up that downpayment on a house or to come up with that security deposit on a rental unit.

Mr. Speaker, unbelievably we are beginning to lose some children to the AIDS virus, and perhaps that is the most shocking thing of all. As the AIDS virus spreads through the drug-abuser community, we are beginning to see children born with AIDS who do not live but 2 years. They suffer, and we are really not doing that much about it, and that came out in our hearings. I think it is very prudent to begin to discuss the status of children in our country at this particular point in the 101st Congress, because as we speak here today there are meetings going on right now over budget negotiations. Unfortunately, President Bush, though making a beautiful speech about the needs of children in our society, about his goal to become the education President, unfortunately he placed all of those programs in what we dubbed a black box, meaning that all of those programs would be essentially frozen at a particular number, last year's number, with no inflation, and if any one of those programs were to grow, it would have to do so at the expense of another program.

Members can imagine the choices that we face if we follow the Bush budget. If we want to spend more on child immunization, we have to take it out of infant mortality; if we want to spend more to stop dropouts from high school, we have to take it from a special reading program in elementary school.

I want to put into the RECORD a number of items which give statistics to back up some of the points I have been making. There are 37 million people under the age of 65 with no public or private insurance coverage for their health care. About 30 percent are poor, 30 percent are near poor, and about 14 million are women of childbearing age, and 11 million of these 37 million without health insurance are children. In 1992 the number of children with AIDS will equal the number of adults with AIDS reported in 1987, so the epidemic of AIDS among little children is just beginning to blossom. Approximately 40,000 babies die in the United States every single year. That is the infant mortality rate that we talked about. The overall infant mortality rate actually increased in the last count in 15 States and the District of Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, this is a national shame. This is a national shame. At current rates of progress, or as I would say, lack of progress, the Nation will not meet the Surgeon General's 1990 prenatal-care goal for all women until the year 2094, so we are more than 100 years behind where we are supposed to be when it comes to prenatal care. The low-birth-weight goal for all infants will not be reached until the year 2031.

Mr. Speaker, we will never meet the Surgeon General's goal for immunizing our youngest children. We will never, never make that goal. This is a national scandal. Should we wait 100 years to meet these goals or just give up on these goals? No. We cannot afford to wait. It is the wrong thing to do.

Four in ten children living in poor working families had no health insurance, public or private, and in 1986, Medicaid covered only half the children in families below the poverty level.

The WIC Program, that is, Women, Infants, and Children, that gives nutrition help to pregnant women, reached only 40 percent of the eligible low-income women, and amazingly, Head Start, a program that has been lauded by Republicans and Democrats and moderates and liberals and conservatives, reaches only 17 percent of those children who are eligible.

Mr. Speaker, we know that Head Start works. The program is 20 years old. We have been able to track those young children. When they are given Head Start, they perform. They do not drop out of high school in the kinds of numbers that others do. They do not get into trouble. They get jobs. We know Head Start works. What a travesty that only 17 percent of the eligible children are reached. This is not an experimental program. This is a proven program.

Another factor: 70 percent of those women with children under 3 years of age are in the workplace and are in need of child care. At this point I want to tell the Members about some testimony that was given to the Budget Committee from a doctor, Dr. Brazelton, a very famous pediatrician who has been on the front page of Newsweek magazine. It was so moving, that I do not think there was a dry eye in the room. What this doctor told us is that in all the years he has been working with women and their infants, in low-income situations and in general hospitals, he notices the bonding that goes on between the women and their children. He works with them to foster that bonding. He holds the baby and he shows the women how that child responds to their love and warmth and they can see the physical response of the child. Dr. Brazelton said to me, "Madam Chairman and members of this committee, I am getting frightened." We said, "Why?" He said, "Because these women are no longer making eye contact with these babies, not all of them, but a substantial number," and he understands what it is. They do not want to make the connection because they are so afraid that they are going to have to leave that child somewhere in a place that they do not really want to leave that child for day care that is not up to standard, and as they go off to the workplace, that they will not be able to give that child the security that that child needs.

What is happening is a whole new set of parents are coming in, and they are afraid to give hope to their children, because the future is so bleak, and, Mr. Speaker, this is a country of hope. This is a country of opportunity, and if young parents do not feel that they can give hope and opportunity to their children, where are we going as a nation? How can we be proud of ourselves as a nation?

Mr. Speaker, we have had many crises in our great Nation, and we have always risen to the occasion, always.

Mr. Speaker, we now have a savings-and-loan crisis, and we are going to find out a way to solve that problem. We have had droughts, and we find out a way to solve the problem. Where I come from, it is earthquake country, and we find ways to solve the problem. When Chrysler went broke, this Congress found a way to solve the problem. When we had a window of vulnerability and we had a problem with the space program, we found a way to solve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, we have a major problem on our hands today. Our children are in crisis. We are losing them, and I am very fortunate that this year I could head the most wonderful task force of the Committee on the Budget, the Human Resources Task Force. On it are people who are so dedicated to bettering the lives of children.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to one of those Members, my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentlewoman from California, and I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to salute my colleague for her fine work on our Human Resources Task Force as part of the work we are doing in the Committee on the Budget.

The Committee on the Budget is many times a very depressing experience. There are so many needs in America and so few resources, but I can tell the Members candidly that the work on this Human Resources Committee has been uplifting, positive, and has really indicated to us that the common complaint that our programs, our governmental programs, are ineffective, wasteful, and duplicative are in this day and age in many respects not directed properly to the programs that we address during this special order.

For you see, Mr. Speaker, we have found over the last 20 years that there have been many experiments in social programs in America which have failed, but likewise there are many which have been resounding successes.

We come today in this special order to speak of those successes and to speak of the continuing challenges that face us.

The first response of anyone who would listen to our remarks from the floor of the House, the listening audience or the gallery, might be, "Oh, here they come again, another group of Congressmen and Congresswomen with some bright ideas that are going to cost me some more money. Well, thanks, but no thanks. It's about time Congress learned to live within its means." For those who fall in that category, the so-called styptic hearted who want to know the bottom line, how much money is this going to cost and what will it save, let me offer a few statistics about just one aspect of the problem facing America today. The problem is the challenge of infant mortality.

Most Americans are surprised, if not shocked, to learn of the dreadful infant mortality rates in the United States. To put the phrase infant mortality in better perspective, we are talking about the death rate of babies in America. How do we rank in the world? In fact, we rank 18th. We are tied for the last among industrialized nations in the world in terms of the survival rate of American babies. We are behind such nations as Spain and Singapore.

American black infant mortality places us 28th in the world, behind the overall rates of Cuba and Bulgaria. A black baby born in this District of Columbia today in the shadow of the White House is more likely to die in the first year of his life than if that baby were born today in Jamaica, Trinidad, Tobago, Chile, Panama, Romania, or the Soviet Union.

Is it expensive? It is expensive if we are looking for the bottom line. Step aside from the loss of human life, that loss of potential, and look what it costs us when we do not invest the necessary money for a child to be born healthy, for the mother to have a successful prenatal experience. If we do not invest the $400 or $500 to take that mother to a doctor, to make certain that she has the care, the nutrition, the vitamins, the nurturing to have a happy and successful pregnancy, we do not usually have a baby born dead, but we have a baby of low birth weight who survives at least for a short period. During that period of survival, if my colleagues want to know the bottom line, we taxpayers pay at least $1,000 a day for that tiny baby, no bigger than the plam of a hand, to survive.

So if we want to know if the bottom line of these programs is worth the investment, it clearly is. For $400 or $500 in prenatal care, primarily for the poor mother, we may save literally thousands of dollars that might otherwise be spent.

But if we want to step aside from the accounting aspect and look at the human side, if we want to join President Bush, as many of us in this Chamber do, to make this a kinder and gentler nation, I would ask one question: Is there one single statistic that we can point to to determine whether a country is a caring country? Is there a statistic more compelling that whether our children survive? As I have said, unfortunately in comparison to so many neighbors around the world, our children are not surviving.

The Surgeon General set out a goal for us in terms of reducing the infant death rate in America. The Children's Defense Fund recently reported that at the current rate of progress, this Nation will not meet the Surgeon General's 1990 goal, the goal for next year, until the year 2094. It will take us 104 years at our present rate of progress to bring down the infant death rate in America.

So what can we do? Is this just another problem that we should worry about and not address?

There are specific things we can do. The WIC Program, for example, women, infants and children, the nutrition program, I invite my colleagues to visit in their community, and it is in virtually every community in America. It brings in the poor mother during pregnancy and the mother and child after birth, and it gives them basic guidance that they need for health care. I visited a WIC Program in my home town of Springfield, IL, just a few weeks ago. What a great, uplifting experience to see these mothers caring for their children, receiving the basic nutrition they need so that these children could be happy and healthy. One could not look in the eyes of those kids and not realize that that was money well spent.

How many of the eligible children in America under the WIC Program are presently being served? Fewer than half, fewer than half. When it comes to prenatal care, the fact is that in many communities doctors will not treat a welfare mother. They do not get enough money from the Government. So they say we cannot afford it. Our malpractice premiums are too high and the Government reimbursement is too low. We have to move on this front, not just to address the malpractice question, which is primarily a State concern, but one which we may have to face in Congress, but also looking at the level of reimbursement. Are we going to make certain that in America today, no matter what the income level, no matter what background, if you are a poor mother you will have access to a doctor, no ifs, ands or buts about it? I think we can afford that.

The bigger question is can we afford not to. Clearly we cannot.

So with the expansion of Medicaid, with the expansion of the WIC Program, with the expansion of maternal health care grants to communities, we will give our communities, the doctors, the hospitals, and clinics the resources to make this a kinder and gentler nation.

I have tried to highlight just one topic today. I might add that in my hometown and community of Springfield, IL, a community which is viewed as certainly having its problems but not the worst in America, we have had to rise to meet the challenge to bring together those in the medical community, those who care in the general community and the social agencies to make certain that care is there for mothers who need it, and we are making progress. It can happen across America, and with a little seed money, with a little help from the Federal Government, with a kind of incentive and direction we can turn around these infant mortality statistics and we can stand here I hope in a few years and say proudly that America has conquered one of the real challenges that faces us in 1989.

The gentlewoman from California mentioned earlier that when we have determination, America always succeeds. I might add a little statistic for the consideration of my colleagues. Some will listen to this speech skeptically and say we cannot afford it. Let me leave my colleagues with these statistics to consider.

Most Americans remember the Marshall plan after World War II. The United States broke historic precedent and as the victor went to the vanquished nations and helped those nations to their feet. We rebuilt their bridges and their factories and hospitals and homes, and we said we are going to get you back on the path of progress, and we did. It is a great credit to our country that we did.

In today's dollars, the Marshall plan would cost us $50 billion. What a sum of money, $50 billion. Imagine if someone came before Congress today and said will you spend $50 billion. The reaction would be we cannot afford it. But please, before reaching that conclusion, allow me to finish, because in the last few months the President and Members of Congress have stood before the American people and said we need $150 billion for the savings and loan crisis. We need $100 billion for the Department of Energy nuclear production facilities problem.

There we have it, ladies and gentlemen, $250 billion which we will find as Americans to address these serious problems, five times the expense of the Marshall plan. When it comes to saving lives in our country, can we spend any less? Can we retreat and say we cannot afford it? And if do so, will we be able to face that next generation and explain how we just could not afford to save those lives?

I think we can. Those of us in Congress are looking forward to helping President Bush make this a kinder and gentler nation.

I thank my colleague from California for this time that she has allowed me today.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank my colleague from Illinois, Mr. DURBIN, for his excellent statement. We can just see it in his face and hear it in his voice, with dedication like that we are going to have a program coming out of the Budget Committee that at least is going to speak for the children of this Nation.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, when I talked initially I mentioned a subject that has been near and dear to me because, unfortunately, in my congressional district I have seen too much of it, and that subject is AIDS. I related it to children, the fact that we are seeing more and more children with AIDS.

Mr. Speaker, we are not doing enough about that. We are not researching enough about that. We do not know the effects, for example, on a mother when she is pregnant and the mother is HIV-positive, whether that in fact the birth of the baby brings on the virus. We do not know enough about the transmission of AIDS from the mother to the child.

There is much we have to do around this whole epidemic.

Mr. Speaker, at this time it gives me great pleasure to yield to a colleague who chairs a very important subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations, the subcommittee which deals with the health issues across the board. Mr. Speaker, our colleague has been a true leader in the AIDS area. When it comes to discussing the budget, he knows where our priorities should be.

So it is a pleasure to me to yield to my colleague from New York, TED WEISS.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the House on the budget for AIDS in fiscal year 1990. I would like to commend our colleague, Congresswoman BARBARA BOXER, the chairman of the Budget Committee Task Force on Human Resources for taking the time to organize this special order.

It just so happens that a number of us who are on the floor at this point, Congresswoman BOXER, Congresswoman PELOSI, and I have had occasion to serve on the Subcommittee on Human Resources and Intergovernmental Relations of the Committee on Government Operations, where we have had a series of hearings over the course of the past 5½ to 6 years on the AIDS epidemic and the AIDS crisis. We have constantly been concerned about the sufficiency or insufficiency, if you will, of the Federal reaction to the crisis with AIDS itself. We also seem to be way behind the curve.

Most recently, as Congresswoman BOXER indicates, the particular aspect of the AIDS epidemic that we have been way behind on is that affecting mothers and babies and young people.

Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee held hearings some 2 weeks ago, and we had the testimony of parents who have lost children or who have children, very young infants, with AIDS. We heard from care providers, especially from the communities most impacted by pediatric AIDS or AIDS which infants have, communities in Newark, NJ, New York City, Miami, FL, and we had some witnesses from Connecticut, which has had its own share of the problem.

But although these are the communities which have most of the problems, of course, it is really a national problem. It is focused primarily in those areas and those people who are intravenous drug users, areas that have large numbers of intravenous drug users.

What has been happening is that the normal practice, as we have been best able to trace from the testimony we have received, is that you have a male user of intravenous drugs who contracts AIDS through the sharing of needles, normally, who then passes it on to the woman who is his sex partner through the sexual act. Then the child who is conceived, in some manner, at some point still not clear, not very clear, also at birth demonstrates that the baby himself or herself is in fact infected with the HIV virus.

Now it gets very complicated because it turns out that in only 20 to 30 percent of the cases is that virus in fact a clear indication of infection, that in 70 to 80 percent of the cases the presence of the virus in fact demonstrates that it may have been just passively acquired at the time of birth.

So there has to be a tremendous amount of work done just to be able to screen so that you can start providing medical attention and care on those infants who are truly in fact infected, rather than those which just seem to be passively carrying the virus or the antibodies without in fact carrying the virus.

What has become very clear is that the problem has been exploding around us and we now have, I think, something between 800 and 1,500 infants.

We will by the end of next year probably have close to 3,000, and the number keeps on growing. It is growing at the same alarming rate as AIDS is growing within the adult community. Of course, the great tragedy is that there are few facilities and those few facilities that do exist for caring for these babies who require a tremendous amount of attention and care and who find themselves in the position where either they themselves die within short order or if they survive, they find that their parents will have died, because both of the parents themselves have in all likelihood had AIDS. So they are orphans. The facilities which do exist are tremendously overburdened. They are stretched paperthin at this point by way of providing care with the present caseload.

We have no planning, no way of providing for increased caseload that the Public Health Service itself has projected. Indeed, the testimony we heard is that the only way they are able to provide care at all is by using research grants that the National Institute of Health provide in order to allow for demonstration programs.

But there is no assurance of an ongoing entitlement program which allows for medical care, inpatient or outpatient, and truly that is not the way that we ought to be dealing with the most vulnerable in our society.

Of course, the problem is related not only to the infants and to the youngsters. The projections are that as of now we have identified some 85,000 cases of people with AIDS from the onset of the disease in 1981, and by 1992, the total number of people identified with AIDS will have reached somewhere around 370,000.

Currently, something like 40,000 people are receiving medical attention, people with AIDS. By 1992, we will have close to 200,000 people, five times as many, who will be requiring medical attention.

Mr. Speaker, where are the doctors and the nurses and the social workers and the facilities going to come from to take care of all of these people? When we questioned the Federal Public Health Service people and the respective agency representatives, it was clear that there are no plans afoot and yet the avalanche is about to descent upon us.

So I think that the work that Congressman BOXER's Budget Committee Task Force has been undertaking is extremely significant. The request of the administration is for $1,600,000,000 in funding for research and education. The request that the Public Health Services have put in were for $2.4 billion. That is a very conservative request and a conservative estimate that still does not provide for permanent entitlements. It simply provides for the kind of research funding and educational outreach which will in fact give us a chance to try to get a better handle on the problems.

I would urge all of my colleagues to follow closely the work of Congresswoman BOXER's task force, that of the Committee on the Budget and that of the various authorizing and appropriating committees, because truly this has to be a unified effort.

We have been hearing the pleas, the cries of despair of health providers from across the country and from communities across the country. It is time that we respond to those pleas and cries of despair with significant funds.

We had one of the witnesses before us who told us that they come down because they feel they have to, but really on top of all the work that they have to do and all the burnout and overload, it gets very frustrating for them to come down and never receive sufficient response from the Congress.

I hope that this year as in previous years, Congress will demonstrate that regardless of the lack of urgency in some aspects of the Federal Government, as far as the executive branch is concerned, that Congress itself recognizes that we must respond with a greater sense of commitment and a greater sense of urgency.

Since AIDS first surfaced as a major public health emergency in 1981, the number of cases has met our worst expectations. By the end of February, there were nearly 88,000 persons reported to the Centers for Disease Control. The Public Health Service estimates that 1 to 1½ million persons are now infected with the virus. Of those, some 40,000 persons with AIDS are alive and requiring medical care. In 1992, close to 200,000 persons with AIDS will need such care, five times the number we are caring for today. In 1990, the year we are addressing at this hearing, as many as 120,000 persons with AIDS will need care.

I believe that the President's fiscal year 1990 budget request goes part of the way toward meeting AIDS funding needs, however, it fails to present an adequate fiscal response to the many research care and prevention programs required to make a legitimate assault on the expanding epidemic. Much more is needed. And, while I advocate the expansion of the AIDS budget, I want to emphasize my opposition to the proposed cuts in other health care programs including biomedical research, care and prevention.

Of the profusion of program and service needs associated with the AIDS epidemic that concern me—protection from discrimination, the search for a vaccine, prevention of transmission and many others—I want to bring to your attention first to the care and treatment of the thousands of persons, young and old, of all races and ethnic groups, who will be diagnosed with AIDS, this year, in 1990 and the succeeding years.

Two weeks ago, the subcommittee which I am privileged to chair held 2 days of hearings as part of a long series on the Federal response to the AIDS epidemic. They were focused on children and adolescents. We heard from a group of care providers who presented stunning information. These witnesses represent some of the best pediatric AIDS programs in the country, and yet they spoke with despair. They told us of their efforts to offer medical care, social services, foster care and education about AIDS to the children who are their patients and their families. One after the other, without exception, they testified that their resources are now stretched paper thin; that they depend on demonstration grants and other temporary funds to run their programs; and that they do not know how they will care for the anticipated increase in the numbers of patients.

I know from having heard testimony at other hearings and from the community that the care problems associated with pediatric AIDS are echoed in the looming crisis in care for adults with AIDS. AIDS must not be used to divide groups vying for assistance. If the virus strikes a child, it also strikes a parent, a sibling, a family with AIDS and all its attendant problems. Without sick mothers, we see very few sick children. There are not now enough resources to adequately care for the needs of persons of any age with AIDS in the most heavily impacted areas. What we will do in 3 years, when the caseload will have increased fivefold, is a question to which the Federal Government must provide an answer.

Currently, the area most neglected by the Federal Government is care for low-income persons with AIDS. I can predict that with no increase in Health Resources and Services Administration's AIDS Service Demonstration Program and Pediatric Service Demonstration Program, and with only a minimal increase in the funding for community and migrant health centers, an even greater obligation will be shifted to the public hospitals, which are already bearing more than their share of the overwhelming burden AIDS brings. In some places, low-income persons seeking health care for conditions other than AIDS are also adversely affected by the large numbers of AIDS patients. I strongly recommend additional resources for medical and nonmedical care—both inpatient and outpatient—for persons with HIV-related illnesses.

A major component of health care is the therapeutic treatment of persons with AIDS. As you know, there is but a single approved antiviral drug—AZT. Scientists at NIH have identified other agents with promise, but they are hampered in their efforts by a shortage of resources. One promising vehicle for expanding drug research and treatment is the community-based research program which shows great potential for extending opportunities for testing new drugs and offering treatment to affected persons across the country. The National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases stated they need $13 million for this program, but the President's budget includes only $8 million.

There are very few clinical trials of treatments for opportunistic infections—the diseases that are contracted by immune deficient persons and that, in most patients, actually do the killing. It is imperative for us to ensure that when promising treatments are developed—be they antivirals or other drugs—NIH has the resources to put them immediately into broad-based clinical trials. We don't have time to wait to test any potential life-saving therapies while others are being studied.

Specialized laboratory space is needed to conduct basic research, and, as evidenced in our recent hearings, there is a desperate need for more clinical trials to test therapies for children and at the same time provide them with treatment they can get nowhere else. Overall, NIAID has stated they need $493 million to get the job done, which is $93 million more than the President's request.

It has often been said that prevention is our only vaccine. It is true, and I, too, am concerned about preventing the transmission of HIV. The virus has infected a disproportionate number of minority persons. Racial and ethnic minorities represent about 22 percent of the U.S. population, but 42 percent of all AIDS cases. The Centers for Disease Control originally requested $116 million for a group of AIDS prevention programs especially targeted on members of minority groups. The President's request for these programs was $16.5 million, only 14 percent of the original request.

Mr. Speaker, as we consider the budget for AIDS in fiscal year 1990, I suggest that we examine the original requests from the agencies in the Public Health Service that are responsible for responding to the epidemic, for they, better than the political policymakers at the higher levels of the administration and the bureaucrats in OMB, know what their needs are. In past years, the Congress has appropriated amounts more nearly equal to the Public Health Service's requests. The Public Health Service requests total approximately $2 billion, which is about $400 million more than the President's budget. At the hearing held by the Budget Committee Task Force on Human Resources, chaired by our distinguished colleague BARBARA BOXER, I asked that the task force include at least this additional amount in their recommendation to the full Budget Committee. I repeat that request today, and urge the committee to respond to the words of despair we heard at the pediatric AIDS hearing, at so many other hearings we have held since this epidemic began, and from communities across the country.

Mrs. BOXER. I want to thank my colleague from New York. What our colleague is saying is we have an explosion coming in this area. The mini-explosions are starting. This is a more scientific prediction than an earthquake prediction or a drought prediction or a flood prediction. We know it is coming. This budget this year, with your help and that of Congresswoman PELOSI and Congressman DURBIN and the others on the task force and outside the task force, who have been working so long and hard in the trenches with your help, I think we can push harder and come up with the dollars that we must come up with because we really do not have any other choice. I want to thank my colleague from the bottom of my heart for coming over this afternoon.

At this point it gives me great pleasure to yield to my colleague from San Francisco, a woman who came to Congress with a purpose, a very clear purpose, and that purpose is to help people, and she has become a leader from day one with the AIDS crisis, she has become a leader in the Central American crisis, she has become a leader in the savings and loan crisis, and she has information, Mr. Speaker, on these issues, that she uses to make her points, and to win many legislative victories, and it is my pleasure to yield to my friend and colleague from California [Ms. PELOSI].

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend my colleague, not only for calling these special orders but for all of her good work as chair on the Committee on the Budget Task Force.

I know we probably explained earlier, but I do want to revisit for a moment the hearing that was held last week under your chairmanship, a very moving occasion, that coupled with Chairman WEISS' committee the week before on pediatric AIDS, if those two hearings were not enough to move Members in Congress to action, I do not know what can.

Of course, as a mother, we, and my colleague and I, join championing these rights and needs of children, but it is impossible to hear the testimony and not do everything in our power to help every child in America, just as we would for our very own child. As Congress begins work on this budget for 1990, and in the subcommittee of Congresswoman BOXER on the Committee on the Budget, I believe it is imperative that we make a decision of Congress to invest our money in the future in our children. It is only fair that we provide them with the basic necessities, shelter, food, medical care, and a good solid education.

It is estimated that we in this country with all of our resources, that we in this country have the highest percentage of children in poverty than any other Western country or Canada. In 1986, 1 out of 5 American children lived in poverty, a 23-percent increase over 1980, compared to 1 out of 9 adults.

As we prepare for the budget, I think it is important for us to understand that for some of us a budget should be a statement of our national values. It should be a list of our priorities of those items that we care about, and in that sense, I believe that our budget should declare that a strong America is a healthy and well-educated America, and we should make budget decisions in that direction. For example, it is essential that we provide accessible health care for America's children and their mothers. We must provide prenatal care. In 1985, 4,000 infants died before reaching their first birthday. Those figures may have been mentioned earlier. That infant mortality figure put the United States behind 18 other industrialized countries, including Japan, Finland, Sweden, and France. With the advanced technology and medical knowledge we have in our society, this is totally unacceptable. Congress and the President need to reevaluate our health service delivery system and assure all women access to prenatal care. Money spent on prenatal care is fiscally, socially, and morally responsible.

Major childhood illnesses can be eliminated, we know this, by making sure all of our children are fully immunized. In 1985 the percentage of children, ages 1 through 4, not immunized against the major childhood diseases, ranged from 26 percent for rubella to 13 percent for diphtheria, tetanus, and pertussis or DPT. The Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, 1988, has many figures on how we can invest in children and how immunization saves us money. It makes fiscal sense. It is estimated that every dollar spent on immunizing small children against common diseases can save $10 later on medical treatment.

With these statistics, we cannot afford to eliminate funding for programs such as early detection, screening, and prevention. Children eligible for Medicaid are able to receive routine checkups by doctor. This seems ordinary to us, too many children in our country are deprived of this simple service. These checkups include measurement of height and weight, eye examination, and a blood test. These simple measures are the very basic tests necessary to make sure that a child is growing and healthy.

We need to reserve these funds and ultimately increase them in order to improve the prevention of children's illnesses. Unfortunately, in my district in San Francisco, we do not have enough funds to follow up with the high-risk children once they return home. If we could enhance the funds for the Early detection, Screening and Prevention Act, we could make health care more accessible either through the home or school. Oftentimes, the mother does not return to the doctor for follow-up checkups due to lack of transportation, work commitments or lack of funds.

Our colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN] went into detail about the WIC Program which is another tool that we have in order to enhance the health and well-being of young children and mothers in America, so I will only say that it is an important program and go on to say that another valuable preventive program is Headstart, a compensatory preschool education program for disadvantaged 3-to-5-year-olds. As you know, Headstart has proven to be highly effective in assisting these children to stay in school through graduation from high school. Headstart needs more money. It is reported that fewer than 20 percent of potentially eligible children participate in the program.

Early intervention in the lives of our children can prevent troubles later in their lives. President Bush has said he wants to be the education President. I certainly hope he does, because I hope he fulfills his rhetorical claim there, because it is important for Members in measuring the strength of our country to measure the education of our people as well as their health.

Chairman WEISS of our committee went into detail about children with AIDS, and as I mentioned earlier, his hearing last week gave us a road map of what needs to be done to fight this program. I will not go further into detail except to say that under the leadership of our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], the Subcommittee on Government Operations got some very good information from our witnesses which will serve us well and hopefully make a very big difference in the availability of drugs for children with AIDS and the funding for these programs.

I hope that the President will take our advice. I hope that he will heed this message that we need to invest in our children. I feel certain that as a father and as a family person, he must know that we need to assure them health care and an education, so that they can grow up to be their best. Investing in our children is the best we can do for our future. I hope you will listen to our message, and more importantly, increase funding for children's programs.

If this is done, I say to my colleague, it will be in large measure the result of her hard work on the Budget Committee and her work in bringing this issue to the forefront that, as we are making our budget decisions, we give, as I mentioned earlier, a statement of our values. Do we measure our strength and our education with the good health of our children? I hope so.

Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], for calling this special order and for all of her hard work.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank very much the gentlewoman from San Francisco, CA, and tell her that her listing of these programs is very important, because that is what we are going to do in the Budget Committee and that is what they are going to do in the Appropriations Committee.

I want to quote from our friend and colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER], the founder of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, because probably if we have to name one protector of kids, he has been here and in the forefront of that issue for such a long time. When he talked about the investment the gentlewoman referred to, he said, "These investments represent the Federal Government's blue chip portfolio, and," he said, "a dollar investment in children shows a much better return than most investments on Wall Street."

So I think the gentlewoman's notion of explaining these programs as investments is totally on target, and that is what we are doing in the Budget Committee.

Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to yield to my friend and colleague, the Chair of the caucus on women's issues, the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER].

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentlewoman from California for yielding and also for calling this special order today.

I think it is very exciting, as we close out the 1980's and look to the 1990's and the 21st century, that we talk about this issue which really has become a competitiveness issue, because if we do not invest in our software, that is our children, then I do not know how we are going to compete against all the other countries that are knocking our socks off in trade and are investing in their children and getting a great return for their investment.

This has been a year where I think the statistics have screamed at us. We have seen statistic after statistic come forward showing that our children are testing at the bottom of the heap vis-a-vis Europeans and Asians and others with whom we are competing. That is a very, very bad trend for the future.

I think so much of what we are talking about here goes back to the old notion in the United States that people should not have families unless they can afford them, and by "afford," we meant in the old manner of "Ossie and Harriet" and "Leave it to Beaver."

But that is only about 7 percent of America's families. So we said to the other 93 percent, "If you went out and had a family and you couldn't afford it in this manner, we are going to punish you." What we never figured out and what every other country did figure out is that we were not punishing them, we were punishing ourselves very severely, because what we were doing was short cutting our future and we were ending up with a work force that was not well trained and, therefore, not as competitive as other work forces.

I think every one of us knows that in the future our young people are not going to need less education, they are going to need more education. One of the things I want to point out is that there really seems to be a bipartisan stirring on this issue. Today I was very excited to get in my office a congressional symposium for a "Kinder, Gentler America for the Adolescents of the 1990's," and this symposium is being sponsored by the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN], who is a very distinguished Republican. She is calling for all sorts of things to be done for the adolescents of the 1990's.

So I think we are seeing a good many Members starting to realize that maybe we have been very penny wise and pound foolish as we squeeze programs out of things for kids, and that we had better start reinvesting. She has a tremendous number of corporate sponsors and a terrific number of speakers who are involved, and they are talking about the role of the family, the community, the government, the individual, education, poverty, poor, housing, health, drugs, and unwed mothers. One would think this was sponsored by a Democrat. This is good news. We are very pleased to see this happening.

We are really pleased to see more and more of corporate America starting to wake up and realize they have not been too wise in this area. We have seen Lee Iacocca move on child care this year, saying that it was a competitiveness issue. I think that all of us certainly know that health care and everything involved with it are very important investments in our future.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, if I may point this out, the gentlewoman is so right to look at this as a competitiveness issue, because we had a gentleman from one of the biggest corporations come before the Budget Committee and call for a $11 billion investment right now in the children of this country, because what he is seeing is what the gentlewoman has described. We could have all the technology in the world, but if we do not have people who can work at those machines, it is not going to do us a bit of good.

So, I am very pleased that the gentlewoman has put it in the category of competitiveness. It is not only the right thing to do and the moral thing to do, it is a competitiveness issue for us in this country.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I know that the gentlewoman from California agrees with me that our most important natural resource is children. It is not coal, it is not oil or anything else. Anyone in business will tell us they can put a plant almost anywhere in the world today because of telecommunications, fax machines, anything they want, and the reason they select one place over another is because of the people. So, therefore, countries that invest in their people are going to get much more back in return, and we have not been investing in our people to the same tune. We have been clinging to some of the old notions that we must challenge.

So I salute corporate America for coming forwad and sponsoring things like this event of the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN], and I support the good gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] for having this debate to tell people, "Look! What is your budget? Your budget is simple. It tells you what you think is most important. If you aren't on the first page of the budget, you aren't important."

Kids have not been on the first page, and they have not been on the last page. They have been falling out of the budget, and it is about time we got them back in, because all the statistics ought to have really jabbed at us this year and awakened us this year. So we had better get on with it.

Mr. Speaker, I really thank the gentlewoman from California for bringing this to our consciousness and for having the hearings that we have heard about. We had Dr. Brazelton, a leading pediatrician, and others who talked about this issue, and I think we cannot surrender one inch on this. If we do not invest in our kids, who will? If we do not, we are the only ones to lose. If we do not invest in our kids, we deserve the future we are going to get.

So, Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman very much for all her best efforts and for her fighting for this issue on the Budget Committee.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues, and I will look to her for help as we do put this budget together.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR], but before I do that, let me express my hope that this much has happened as a result of this special order: That a message will go out to the families and the children of our Nation that they are not forgotten, that in fact they are an essential point of the debate on this budget, and that they are going to be put up against every bomb in the budget and that they are going to be put up against every item in the budget to which we give such special attention. And we are not going to give up our efforts in this Congress until we can really put dollars behind our rhetoric. And to reiterate, these are not dollars on some new-fangled ideas but dollars that go into programs that work, dollars that go into programs that are proven money savers. All of those programs that we have heard about in this special order save for every dollar invested $3 to $10, and if we do not invest up front, we have to pay at the other end; we pay when the kids get sick, we pay it out when they are born prematurely, and we pay it when they drop out of school.

Mr. Speaker, I see one of my dear friends, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN], has come in, and I will later yield to him.

First, however, Mr. Speaker, I know that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] has a sad announcement to make, and I yield first to him.

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE JIM O'HARA

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness today that I rise to pay tribute to a great man, my predecessor in Congress from Michigan's 12th Congressional District, Jim O'Hara, who passed away last night.

As all of us know, Jim was well loved in this city, and particularly on this Hill. He was greatly respected in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, many current Members count themselves fortunate to have been close friends with Jim O'Hara. His popularity back home in Michigan, particularly in my district, is legendary. Wherever I went for lo these 13 years that I have been fortunate enough to have succeeded him, people would say, "Give my best to Jim" or, "How is Jim doing," and, "We love him," "We miss him," "Let him know how much we think of him."

Mr. Speaker, it was indeed one of the great privileges of my political life to succeed him here representing the people of the 12th District of Michigan. All of us, I think, feel a certain sense of awe when we first come to Congress to serve the people who have elected us, but for me the sense of pride and responsibility was even greater because I followed an individual who had an enormous amount of respect in this institution and throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, Jim O'Hara served with enormous distinction for two decades in this body, and my colleagues know that he championed landmark civil rights legislation, labor legislation, education legislation, antipoverty programs during the 1960's, and I might say to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], my friend who has raised the issue of families and budgets here this afternoon, that he was a great champion of the family.

Indeed Jim O'Hara had a wonderful family and has a wonderful family. He was a guiding light behind the reforms that opened up this institution to become a truly democratic body. The working people of this country never had a better friend in this Congress than Jim O'Hara. Jim was loved by his family, his wife, Susan, and their children, and I want to extend to them my deepest condolences.

Mr. Speaker, the death of Jim O'Hara is a great personal loss to me and to his constituents and, I believe, to all the people of this Nation.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR], and I extend my condolences to him and to his constituents.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, maybe save 30 seconds, to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN], my friend and colleague, a person who has worked so long and hard on trying to set the priorities of this country straight.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] for yielding to me, and I certainly want to compliment her for the leadership she has shown down and through the years in trying to address the budget priorities of this country and this Government.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] believes, as I do, that a budget is more than a ledger, a simple column of numbers. I think that she believes, as I do, that a budget is a dollars-and-cents statement of national values, and where we put money and where we take it away really defines who we are as a people, as a country.

Mr. Speaker, the focus of the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] today on children I think is particularly apt, and I join her in raising this priority, and hopefully the consciousness of the membership of this body, to the priority of our children.

One of my colleagues earlier pointed out the truth, that one out of five children under the age of 18 in America today is poor. One out of four children in America today at the age of three is poor. In housing, according to the National Academy of Sciences, 100,000 American children go to sleep homeless every night.

Mr. Speaker, let us talk about hunger. Malnutrition affects 500,000 American children. This is one of the most economically robust nations of the world. Six hundred thousand fewer low-income children receive free school lunches every day due to the Reagan budget cuts of the last few years.

In health the latest statistics show that 2.2 million children are reported as abused every year in the United States of America. Twelve million children have no health insurance whatsoever. The U.S. infant mortality rate ranks the United States 18th in the world, and, unless something is done, 15,000 American infants will die in the year 2000 before their first birthday.

Mr. Speaker, I think these are deplorable statistics, and, if one thinks back to what a budget is, a dollars-and-cents statement of values, then I would ask my colleagues if they think these statistics are a true reflection of their values or the values of their constituents when at the same time we are being asked to spend hundreds of billions of dollars in redundant missile systems, in silos that are not needed for this country's security, in star wars defense schemes that will not work and will, in fact, make the world more dangerous, not less dangerous.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will agree with the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] and myself that that imbalance, that warp in values that we are seeing today, needs to be redressed. I would hope also, as we take a look at the problems of children and our need to fund their needs, that we will pay attention in this budget year to the handicapped education.

Mr. Speaker, this Government, when it mandated mainstreaming education for our handicapped children, did a very altruistic thing. It said that no matter what a person's gift at birth may be, a person should not be placed out of the classroom simply because they are handicapped. However, the Federal Government did something else when it mandated that on our local school districts. It promised Federal support to finance that mandate by 40 percent of the total cost.

Mr. Speaker, we have never kept that promise, and the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] who serves on the Committee on the Budget knows that the last Reagan budget reduces that level of Federal support to 7 percent meaning that fully 93 percent of those costs are pushed off into our local school districts.

What does that mean? It means that excellent teachers are spread too thin. It means that kids, handicapped or nonhandicapped, are not getting the individualized instruction that we need today. It means that quality education is not occurring. It means that textbooks that could be published are not being published. It means that we are not making our commitment.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that, as we address the problem of children, that we look at increasing the budget allocation for special education as well so that teachers who want to teach can teach, school districts that want to produce kids who are capable of meeting the commitment, and the challenges that our economy is going to face in the future will be fully competitive.

I am appalled that last year U.S. high school graduates ranked 13th in the world in worldwide competition in science and math skills. Unless we improve the quality of instruction in the local classrooms, unless we provide individualized instruction, unless we have the Federal Government live up to its promise on these mandates that we impose on school districts, those statistics are only going to get worse, and, as they get worse, so will America's competitive position.

The gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] is a genuine leader in this respect in focusing on human values. I join her today, and I compliment her for the leadership she has shown, and she can count on me to help her and others to try to right some of these imbalances and set them straight as we approach this budget here.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN] so much for joining, the fifth Member to join in this special order. I think, as the gentleman said so clearly, nothing less than the future of our country is at stake, and I think, after we add up what we all said here today, that there is only one message.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to ignore our children. We have to pay attention to this problem. I hope that we will.

I really give a heartfelt thanks to all my colleagues who took their very valuable time to come over for what I hope will be a meaningful special order and a meaningful message to this entire Congress to the President and to this entire country.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 1231, DIRECTING THE PRESIDENT TO ESTABLISH AN EMERGENCY BOARD TO INVESTIGATE AND REPORT ON THE EASTERN AIRLINES DISPUTE

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 101-6) on the resolution (H. Res. 108) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1231) to direct the President to establish an emergency board to investigate and report respecting the dispute between Eastern Airlines and its collective bargaining units, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

THE FAMILY LIVING WAGE ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIN). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the topic today for this special order is the topic of the Family Living Wage Act, which has been introduced by our colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. TOM PETRI. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI] began preparing and circulating the living wage proposal approximately 2 years ago. He offers it along with a number of sponsors in the Congress with a widespread amount of support in the rest of the country from all sections of the country, from all types, from all income levels. He offers a living wage proposal as an alternative to the increase in minimum wage which is currently making its way through the committees and to the House floor next week.

What the bill of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI] does, and I am going to take this 60 minutes to put into the RECORD some discussion of the facts and commentary that has been made on the living wage. What the bill of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI] does is to focus on the goal of providing a living wage for working Americans who are working for a living, raising their families, and attempting to increase their standard of living and the take-home pay for low-income heads of households who are working.

It enjoys a broad breadth of support from conservatives to liberals, to middle of the roaders. It enjoys support from employers and employees alike.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I yield to one of those early supporters of the Living Wage bill, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BALLENGER].

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, earlier today, the House Education and Labor Committee approved H.R. 2, a bill that increases the Federal minimum wage to $4.65 per hour over 3 years. However, well-intentioned, there seems to be broad agreement among economists that enactment of H.R. 2, will neither reduce poverty nor more fairly redistribute income. In fact, passage of the legislation will result in a loss of jobs and hurt the very individuals it is intended to help.

A workable alternative to increasing the minimum wage does exist. Representative TOM PETRI has introduced the "Family Living Wage Act." This proposal shares an identical goal with that of increasing the Federal minimum wage. It would provide direct financial assistance to workers at the bottom rung of the income ladder and it would accomplish that goal without a harmful impact on American competitiveness.

Unfortunately, because of committee jurisdictional concerns, this sensible solution was not allowed to be debated by the House Education and Labor Committee. I commend my colleagues for scheduling this special order to point out the merits of the Petri proposal.

As many of you know, Congress last amended the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1977 and the last 25 cent increase went into effect in 1982. Those who favor increasing the minimum wage argue that it benefits low-paid, unskilled and entry-level workers. Increasing the minimum wage will reduce poverty by simply paying a higher base wage.

At first glance, this seems like a reasonable approach. But if the solution to poverty is that simple, why stop at a $4.65 minimum wage? Let's raise it to $20 an hour and guarantee every entry-level, low-skilled worker $40,000 a year. Ridiculous? Of course. Massive unemployment would result because employers cannot pay entry-level workers that salary. The same principle applies to raising the minimum wage to $4.65 an hour.

The fact is that increasing the minimum wage is expensive. Economists estimate that the 1977 wage increase resulted in: the direct loss of 644,000 jobs, loss of job creation, and higher inflation.

If a minimum wage increase puts more people out of work, reduces the number of new jobs, and causes the cost of products and services to increase, who benefits?

Every economic study ever done on the consequences of increasing the minimum wage concludes that some job loss occurs. A study in American Economic Review states:

> There is practically no evidence that minimum wage rate provisions increase the earnings or improve the poverty position of the least educated. * * * Thus the minimum wage policy appears to be a poor policy with effects that often have been misunderstood or misrepresented.

The Minimum Wage Study Commission, established by Congress in 1977, noted that 9 out of 10 U.S. families are worse off when the minimum wage is increased.

Representative PETRI's bill, the Family Living Wage Act attacks the root problem of the working poor. It increases the after-tax earnings, and the take-home pay that buys groceries and clothes.

The Family and Living Wage Act expands the earned-income tax credit (EITC) and varies the benefits of that credit according to family income and size. In addition, the bill combines the current EITC and the dependent care credit (DCC) to create a comprehensive program to help families and children. The Petri bill will provide workers at the minimum wage level a base credit of $1,050 per year. In addition, for every preschool child the family will receive a credit of $700 per year and a credit of $350 for every school age child, up to four children. For instance, a family with four preschool children would receive the maximum credit of $3,850 per year. A low wage earner with two preschool children would receive $2,450 per year. These amounts are fully indexed to inflation. The Petri bill also creates a minimum EITC benefit that phases out once family income reaches $40,000.

The Family Living Wage Act costs about the same as the dependent care tax credit, however the benefits reach many more families and children.

The EITC approach would be targeted to those who need help the most and does not increase labor costs and the costs of production. The working poor would take home more money after taxes, but face little risk of losing their jobs.

Thus the Petri approach accomplishes the goals of a minimum wage increase—without putting jobs at risk or threatening U.S. business competitiveness.

The Family Living Wage Act is a workable alternative. It helps the working poor, without creating a new spiral of inflation and putting young fast-food workers out of work.

As many of you may have heard, the House is scheduled to debate H.R. 2 on the floor next week. I urge each of my colleagues to give the Petri proposal the serious and thoughtful consideration that it deserves.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his contribution and for his leadership on the Education and Labor Committee.

Mr. Speaker, let me walk through exactly what the living wage proposal does and then offer the House some contrast with the living wage and the minimum wage proposal which came through the Education and Labor Committee this morning.

First of all, the living wage proposal is an expansion of a tax credit that has been in current law for some time. Presently in current law we provide for what is called an earned income tax credit. It is a limited tax credit that has had some modest but limited success. The tax credit essentially provides for up to an $800 tax credit for low income workers on a per worker basis.

The problem with the tax credit is twofold. First of all, you have to wait until the end of the year to be able to obtain any benefits from the tax credit when you file a tax return. Thus you limit the amount of impact it can have on a worker's immediate life.

Second, a worker gets the same tax credit whether that worker is a head of a household or is a single worker with no dependents. That is the change that will be made by the Petri proposal.

Essentially the family living wage proposal would propose that a low-income worker would receive up to $700 per year of direct tax credit per preschool child who is a dependent and up to $350 per year per dependent who is a school-age child. That is in addition to the $1,000 per worker tax credit. So a worker then would obtain an earned income tax credit of $1,000 for himself or herself, $700 for every preschool child and $350 for every school-age child.

Thus, the Petri living wage proposal would adjust the earned income tax credit for family size or dependent size. Thus the earned income tax credit would put into the worker's pocket an increase of take home pay based on the size of that worker's family.

In addition to that, this proposal would make the earned income tax credit refundable against FICA taxes. FICA taxes currently are collected at the rate of around 15 percent per employee. That is employer and employee combined in contributions, and it is that 15 percent as a payroll tax, the first 15 percent of the first $40,000 of income, which is one of the primary impediments to job creation in this country.

It is also 15 percent that is a very regressive tax, that keeps workers from working because that 15 percent is taken directly away from them and they cannot use it for themselves.

So the Petri proposal would turn that on its head and would say that in that worker's take home paycheck, in that week's paycheck the worker would be entitled to a refundable tax credit of up to $1,000 per worker, plus $700 per preschool child, plus $350 per school-age child.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of an expansion of minimum wage or an increase in the minimum wage is to assist low income heads of households who are trying to support their families on a minimum wage or slightly above minimum wage pay scale. The minimum wage does not achieve that purpose very well, but the Petri living wage proposal accomplishes that purpose with a great deal of precision.

Indeed, the living wage proposal is better, faster, more direct and more compassionate than any comparable increase in the minimum wage.

The Petri proposal has been recognized in a variety of places, and at this point I am inserting into the RECORD two editorials which were done during 1988, one in July 1988, and the other one in September 1988, by the New York Times. I am inserting those into the RECORD at this time.

[From the New York Times, July 11, 1988]

BETTER THAN $3.35, $4.25 OR EVEN $5.05

Should the Federal minimum wage, frozen at $3.35 an hour since 1981, be raised?

Absolutely! say labor unions and their liberal allies, arguing that it's not fair to ask someone to work for less than is needed to keep a family above the poverty line.

Outrageous! say business groups. Raising the minimum wage would hurt poor people by pricing hundreds of thousands of unskilled workers out of the labor market and pushing them onto the welfare rolls.

Who's right? Both sides are. But both sides, eager to claim the high ground, ignore an alternative that would accomplish what each wants, to raise the incomes of the working poor without reducing jobs. It's called the earned income tax credit and expanding it would be the best remedy of all.

House Democrats back a plan to raise the minimum wage to $5.05 by 1992. The Senate is almost certain to vote for some smaller increase. The best guess now is that Congress will compromise on a veto-proof increase to $4.25.

That may please unions looking for a political victory. And it may please business lobbies that had expected to absorb a larger increase. But it should not satisfy anyone who cares about the plight of poor Americans who are willing to work.

A 90 cent increase over three years would still leave minimum wage workers with less buying power than they had in 1981, and roughly 20 percent less than the income needed to keep a family of three out of poverty. And it would reduce employment. Impartial economists estimate the job loss for the vulnerable 16- to 24-year-old age group at approximately 250,000.

There's a better way: use wage subsidies to increase worker's take-home pay without increasing employers' labor costs. The mechanism for doing that already exists: the earned income tax credit. All that's needed is to increase the maximum credit and link it to family size.

Congressman Thomas Petri, a Wisconsin Republican and stubborn advocate of the tax-credit alternative, enumerates its advantages over the minimum wage:

It is a snap to administer. The computers that withhold payroll and income taxes can easily add tax credit.

It creates no incentives for evasion, because it doesn't threaten workers' jobs or raise employers' costs.

It can be precisely targeted to aid the working poor. Under the Petri plan, middle-class teen-agers working part time would not receive a cent. But a garment worker supporting four children on $6 an hour would end up with 10 percent more take-home pay.

If an expanded E.I.T.C. is such a hot idea, why are both Congress and the Reagan Administration cool to it? In part because it distracts from the symbolic battle between labor and business and in part because it would complicate the political problem of meeting deficit reduction targets.

A 90 cent increase in the minimum wage would raise welfare costs and kick up inflation by a fraction of a percentage point, adding a few billion dollars to the budget deficit. But the effect would be indirect, and thus possible to ignore under the deficit reduction law.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, the increase in the carefully targeted tax credit proposed by Mr. Petri would enlarge the budget deficit by only half as much. But the budgetary effect would be direct and thus subject to the deficit reduction law.

In other words, the only defect of the tax credit is administrative appearances. In every other respect, expanding it would be far superior to raising the minimum wage. Sadly, appearances seem to matter more in Washington than the dignity and income of poor people.

A SMARTER WAY TO HELP THE WORKING POOR

The earned income tax credit is a negative income tax, first established in 1975 to offset the Social Security taxes paid by low income families. It is available only to working poor people with dependent children. In 1987, some four million families with less than $6,080 in earned income were entitled to a 14 percent credit, or a maximum of $851. The credit is automatically added to weekly paychecks; no additional forms need be filled out. The subsidy gradually decreases as income increases, disappearing entirely at $15,432.

Congressman Petri proposes to increase the credit and tie it to family size. The maximum for an income of $8,000, would range from $1,000 for a one-child family to $2,500 for four or more children. It would phase out at an income of $18,000.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 21, 1988]

THE MINIMUM WAGE: A BETTER WAY

A job at the current Federal minimum wage of $3.35 an hour pays just $6,700 a year. Is it humane to ask anyone to clean offices or pump gas for that amount, which is only half of what it takes to keep a family of four out of poverty?

Surely not. But the remedy proposed by Congressional Democrats is not humane, either. They would raise the minimum wage to $4.55, pushing thousands of needy workers off the job rolls. Happily, there's another remedy that's humane and sensible, and that has no adverse employment effects: expand an existing Federal program to supplement wages, the earned income tax credit.

A bipartisan effort to do just that, led by Representative Thomas Petri, a Wisconsin Republican, is probably doomed this Presidential election year because both parties would rather embarrass each other than reduce poverty. But that's no reason to rush to raise the minimum wage. The tax credit belongs high on the legislative calendar next year, no matter who wins the White House.

Five out of six jobs paying the minimum wage are not held by poor people at all, but by the teenage children of middle-income families or by second earners in families with few children. But one in six is still a lot of people. According to Ronald Mincy, a researcher at the Urban Insititute, increasing the minimum wage by just a dollar would lift nearly 100,000 families above the poverty line.

The catch is that a higher minimum wage would also induce businesses to get by with fewer employees. By conservative estimate, a dollar increase would eliminate 250,000 jobs, most held by people under age 24. For some, loss of a job might mean only the loss of movie money. But as Mr. Mincy points out, it would deprive others of the work experience needed to break the cycle of poverty. That's where the Petri plan fits in.

Wage subsidies have been built into the Federal tax code since 1975. Some four million poor families with children receive tax credits—cash payments—of up to 14 percent of wages, or a maximum of $870 annually. Mr. Petri would raise the maximum, and link payments to need. A family of six subsisting on $8,000 would receive $2,500.

Unlike an increased minimum wage, the expanded earned income tax credit would add nothing to employers' costs and create no incentives for evasion for payroll cuts. Targeting would be precise. Suburban teenagers wouldn't get a penny, while a $12,000-a-year garment worker supporting three kids would receive an extra 60 cents an hour.

Why, then, has Mr. Petri's plan received so cold a shoulder in Congress? Many Republicans are obsessed by the idea of a two-tier minimum, with a lower rate for teenagers. Many Democrats are eager to placate organized labor by voting to raise the minimum wage, and even more eager to embarrass George Bush by forcing the White House veto just before the election.

The best hope now is for Senate Republicans to kill the minimum wage bill in coming days. That would clear the decks for a fresh, bipartisan look at the earned income tax credit next year.

Today H.R. 2, the minimum wage expansion bill, was marked up and passed out of the Committee on Education and Labor on what regrettably was a straight party-line vote, and I say regrettably because it seems to me that here is an issue in which both parties can agree. Indeed, the chairman of the committee once again indicated his support for the living-wage proposal as a way of helping low-income heads of households. The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY], had already indicated his support of the living-wage proposal. Indeed, he was a cosponsor of the bill as he was in the last session.

Mr. Speaker, once again, the Committee on Education and Labor shirked its responsibility to speak for the needs of low-income heads of households and, instead of even considering the living-wage proposal, instead passed out the tired, outdated, outmoded proposal to increase the minimum wage as a response.

I want to take a few minutes at this point and walk through a comparison of the statistics, the relationship between poverty and the minimum wage, and the living-wage proposal, because I think by doing that the House will see as many in the country have already seen that an increase in the minimum wage by no means would help those who are in poverty and trying to work their way out, but an increase in the living wage at a relatively modest cost to the Federal Government, in fact, will allow persons who are low income and supporting dependents to be able to continue to work, have more take-home pay in their pocket, and be able to work their way above the poverty level, which theoretically is the stated goal of the increase in minimum wage.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, I yield to the chairman of the Republican Research Committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER], if the gentleman is prepared.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, first, just let me thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] for taking out this special order.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman take his time back and walk through this comparison that he just spoke about. I have been listening a little bit while the gentleman has been talking, and as I understand it, the chief difference between the Democrat proposals and the creative proposal for the living wage that the gentleman from Texas has come up with is that basically the Democrat leadership cannot guarantee that once they raise the minimum wage to a level that many employers will find unbearable, they cannot guarantee that when that young person walks back in to get his job the next Monday after this bill might have passed that there is going to be a job for that young man.

Under the proposal of the gentleman from Texas, there will be a job, and there will be more incentive for the employer to continue to pay him?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is correct. In fact, under an increase in the minimum wage, it not only will not help the people who the sponsors of it say they want to help, which is low-income heads of households, in fact, it will cost many of them their jobs, because they will suffer a tremendous loss of jobs as the jobs are taken out of the marketplace.

The living-wage proposal, on the other hand, would preserve the same number of jobs. There would be no job loss, because the Federal Government would be saying that this kind of proposal in fact is a social or a public-policy proposal and, therefore, the taxpayers are willing to pay for it as a matter of public policy, as opposed to mandating the costs onto the low-income workers who would lose their jobs through minimum-wage increase.

Let me walk through some of the statistics on the comparison of the relationship between poverty and minimum wage. Today in America there are approximately 20 million individuals who are living at under the poverty level as adjusted for family size. That includes about 7 million households altogether. There are 3.9 million persons, employees, who are today earning the minimum wage at $3.35 an hour. The proponents of the minimum-wage increase would try to leave the impression that we can help those who are living in poverty by increasing the minimum wage for the 3.9 million who are earning minimum wage.

The difficulty with that is out of the 3.9 million persons who are earning minimum wage, only 336,000 of them are living at the poverty level. Indeed, most minimum-wage workers are not in poverty at all. They are the dependents, the sons or daughters, of middle-income families whose total family incomes are far in excess of both the minimum wage and any kind of a poverty level. Indeed, only 13.9 percent of all minimum-wage workers, or only 400,000 minimum-wage workers, are in fact the heads of households. Most minimum-wage workers are not supporting dependents. They are single. They are working part-time voluntarily, and most are the dependents of other heads of households who are earning in excess of the minimum, in excess of both the minimum wage and the poverty level.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to help those 20 million Americans who are living under the poverty level, providing an increase of the minimum wage of 336,000 of them at a cost of a loss of jobs for far more than that would have no impact on the 20 million Americans who are living in poverty, but it would put more of them out of work.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, let me get this straight, because I think the gentleman is hitting a key point here: He is saying that of 20 million people who are under the poverty level in the United States of America, raising the minimum wage to whatever level, if we raised it to $10 an hour, we would still only be helping 336,000 of those 20 million people, so the gentleman is saying that over 19 million of those people, of those 20 million people under the poverty level, 19 million people are going to be still under the poverty level regardless of where the minimum wage is?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is correct. Of the 20 million Americans living under the poverty level, a minimum wage increase from $3.35 an hour to $4.65 an hour could, at most, only affect 336,000 of them, because there are only 336,000 minimum-wage workers who are living under the poverty level. The rest of the minimum-wage workers are the dependents of families who are way above the poverty level and about whom, in fact, a discussion about the poverty level is totally irrelevant because they are not under the poverty level.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. It appears to me we are talking about something that is very important to Americans right now and to many of those families whom the gentleman is speaking about, because we are talking about apparently a lot of families who have youngsters who are undergoing their first jobs right now, taking their first jobs, their dads and moms have asked them to go out and look for jobs to learn what it is to work, and they are starting to climb the work-ethic ladder, if you will, getting maybe that first job at a McDonald's or some other place. They are learning how to dress for a job, they are learning discipline, they are learning attention to detail, they are learning the ability to take orders from people, they are learning to show up on time for work, they are learning to work, the work ethic, and they are learning what it is going to take to climb the ladder of opportunity in the United States; and the gentleman is saying that if we kick this minimum wage up to $4.65 or something else that is unacceptable to a lot of those employers where we have those employers saying, "I will do that job myself. I will sweep out the place myself; no use having that young person do it, because I cannot afford the extra dollars," and we are going to deny those young people the chance to learn how to work in America? Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is correct. Indeed, an increase in the minimum wage, first of all, does not solve the problem if the problem is to increase the standard of living for low-income heads of households, because low-income heads of households are not the minimum-wage workers. The minimum-wage workers are single dependents of middle-income workers, so first of all, it does not even address the problem and, secondly, of those workers that the gentleman described who have obtained their entry-level jobs through a minimum-wage job, those workers are denied that first job. It is those workers who are entering the marketplace for the first time or perhaps reentering the marketplace after having been out of work for a while, either a displaced homemaker, a recovering alcoholic, or someone coming out of prison, those people coming into the workplace need a chance to get that very first job as an entry-level job, and I would say to the gentleman that we had testimony all during the last session of Congress in hearing after hearing with witness after witness on the Labor Standards Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives, and it is not known as a Republican committee, and yet we had testimony after testimony, witness after witness who told us that the minimum wage is used in reality as an entry-level wage, and who told us that if we increased that entry-level wage by any significant amount, what we will do and what will happen is employers will lop off those entry-level jobs, causing those other employees to double up and do those less productive jobs that are not worth $4.65 an hour and, in fact, those jobs will simply go away.

I want to try to put it in some real terms. One national restaurant chain came to the committee and was willing to allow us to use their name. It was very courageous on their behalf. It was Steak-and-Ale, a large restaurant chain with headquarters in Dallas. This restaurant chain brought to the committee the internal memorandum which Steak-and-Ale restaurant had sent to their store managers during the period of 1978 to 1981, a memorandum detailing the requirement to eliminate jobs in every store directly based on the minimum wage increase. Every Steak-and-Ale store in this country was required to eliminate six jobs per Steak-and-Ale store, two bus boys, two assistant hostesses, and two waiters or waitresses. Those six individuals were put out of work by an act of Congress. Their jobs were eliminated by something Congress did.

I have to tell my colleagues that it was not just Steak-and-Ale. Steak-and-Ale happened to be a courageous company that was willing to use their name. But I could also tell of an international department store or retailer who would not allow their name to be used, but who showed the committee their internal documents demonstrating the exact mechanism which they used to pare down or to reduce their work force by I forget the exact number, but several hundred thousand man-hours a year in direct response to the minimum wage increase, because they have to stay competitive and they have to stay competitive with what their customers are willing to pay.

I sit and I think about the working mother who used to work for that department store, who was laid off as a result of misguided legislation in 1978 and 1981 and realize that she was laid off, and she may have never gotten a job again, she was laid off for no fault of her own, but her job was eliminated by an act of a very political Congress. The difficulty is that it is beginning to happen again. It all becomes politics.

Let me describe to the gentleman what happened this morning in the Committee on Education and Labor. The chairman of that subcommittee said that he supported the living wage and he was an original cosponsor of the living wage bill, as he had said before. The chairman of the full committee said he supported a living wage in concept, and he thought it ought to be done. But at the subcommittee level they would not make it in order, so apparently they were more interested in the politics of moving a piece of paper that said minimum wage than interested in preserving and protecting the jobs of low-income heads of households.

This morning in committee I offered the living wage proposal as a substitute for the minimum wage and was once again ruled out of order. So I offered a resolution that was simply and direct in a way to try to break the impasse and get the politics behind us. It would simply say that the Education and Labor Committee, since no one spoke against it, that the Education and Labor Committee would ask that the Rules Committee make living wage in order on the House floor next Tuesday. If indeed the living wage proposal is not within the jurisdiction of the Education and Labor Committee, which its opponents say it is not, if it is not, it is surely within the jurisdiction of the U.S. House of Representatives. It is surely within our jurisdiction next Tuesday to take up the one proposal that can save jobs, that can help low-income heads of households support their families, and take it up and vote on it up or down on this House floor. But once again, the chairman of the committee said that while he was for it in concept, he was not for considering the living wage at this time, in this form, in this place, on this bill, and he was not sure that he would be for considering it next Tuesday on the House floor.

I want to suggest that we really need to find a way to put politics behind us, because there are individual human beings who are going to lose their jobs if we pass a minimum wage, and there are individual human beings, if we pass the living wage, who cannot only keep their jobs, but whose lives will be improved by their own hard work, simply by an act of Congress.

Let me put into the RECORD one other comment on jobs. There have been several estimates, but no one, no economist, no official reports, no Democrat report, no Republican report, no conservative report, no liberal report, no editorial, no think tank, no study anywhere at any time for any reason has ever come out and said that an increase in the minimum wage to $4.65 an hour would not cost jobs. The estimates vary as to how many jobs it will cost. The Congressional Budget Office, which is hardly an arm of the Republican leader's office, has estimated that the minimum wage increase to $4.65 would cost 500,000 jobs. Five-hundred thousand people, many young people would be put out of work and would not get a chance to have that first job.

Beryl Sprinkel, the Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers in the last administration, estimated that there would be a job loss of 650,000 jobs at $4.65 an hour and, in fact, he estimated that the teenage unemployment rate in our Nation's cities, already at an all time high, would increase by 2.9 percent.

A study was done 2 years ago by an organization in Washington known as the Robert R. Nathan & Associates, which is a think tank in Washington, which has traditionally done work for organized labor. That is, essentially it has been a think tank associated with organized labor. They estimated a minimum wage increase to $4.65 an hour would put 882,000 young people out of work. I want the Congress to focus for just a moment on that number, 882,000, or maybe as few as 500,000, according to the CBO, maybe as many as 882,000 according to Robert R. Nathan & Associates, a think tank. I want my colleagues to take from the macronumber of 882,000 and think about that 1 individual, 24-year-old mother with 2 children who is working her way or attempting to work her way out of poverty, who has gotten that first job, who is perhaps an assistant cashier, an assistant hostess in a restaurant, perhaps she is working with minimum skills that she is increasing in a factory somewhere. Perhaps she is a shipping clerk who has been able to get that first job at $3.35 an hour and she knows that if she shows up for work on time, if she learns to get along with her fellow workers, if she learns in fact to smile at the customers and to do those minimum things that her employer requires, she knows that that $3.35 is going to be raised up to $4 an hour perhaps in 2 months, perhaps to $4.50 an hour in 4 months. There were a regular set of increases because, Mr. Speaker, that is the way the real world works. The way the real world works is $3.35 is simply an entry level job amount. She knows before long she is going to be able to support those children of hers, be able to send them to school, be able to provide for their clothes and their food, and be able to provide the kind of life that they deserve.

But she also knows that if Congress acts on a $4.65-an-hour minimum wage she will never get that first $3.35-an-hour job. She will never have the chance to work her way out of poverty.

I want to tell my colleagues that working your way out of poverty in the city, and I am from the city, working your way out of poverty in an urban area is tough enough. You have to deal with the onslaught of drugs, you have to deal with crime in your neighborhoods, you have to deal with a transportation system that sometimes does not get you to work when and where you need to get to work. You have to deal with neighbors that sometimes tell you that you should not try so hard. You have to deal with minimum skills, perhaps illiteracy.

By adding this burden onto her shoulders it will be just that one extra burden that for her and 882,000 just like her, she will never get started. And if she does get started, her children will not get started.

Contrast that for a second with the alternative. The alternative is so basic, the alternative is to take that young mother and to give her a tax credit, adjust the tax credit that she is already entitled to under current law, to say that she can get that tax credit in her take-home paycheck at the end of every week, not like the middle American or upper income earner where we file our tax returns at the end of the year and we find out whether we get a refund or we pay a little bit. But she is living from week to week. She takes that paycheck and cashes it and uses it to buy food.

The Petri proposal just says we are going to give her what she has already earned, and she does not have to wait a whole year to get it.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

□ 1630

Mr. HUNTER. The gentleman is telling me that from the worker's standpoint, the worker is going to be receiving as much money under the living wage proposal that the gentleman from Texas and Mr. PETRI have developed as they would under a $4.65 minimum wage law?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am suggesting to the gentleman that that young mother under the Petri proposal receives a lot more. She is empowered to earn her own way.

That young mother with two children if she is earning $4 an hour with an earned income tax rate under Petri that $4 an hour with two children is converted to $5.32 an hour equivalent. She would have to go out and get a job at $5.32 an hour to earn the equivalent of $4 an hour under the Petri proposal.

Now let me suggest to you what happens if she works her way up to $5 an hour. I am sorry. Now this is the same mother. Let me tell you what would happen if instead of two kids she is a lot worse off and she has four kids—let me rephrase that. She is not worse off with four kids; she is better off because her wealth is in her children. But those children have to eat and they have to have clothes so they are more expensive. So that young mother has four preschool children and under the Petri proposal her empowered take-home pay becomes the equivalent of $6.08 an hour. There is no Government program, not minimum wage or anything else that can provide that kind of an impact on her life to earn $4 an hour and have it converted to the take-home equivalent of $6.08 an hour.

And when you begin to empower that worker with that kind of take-home, then she can change her life and she can change the lives of her family for a long time to come.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand it, what the gentleman is saying is that the workers of America under the Petri-Bartlett proposal get to have their cake and eat it, too. They get to keep their job which is the most important thing. When they go to work that next Monday morning after Congress has acted, they are not going to find that the door has been closed because the employer can no longer afford to pay them. They get to keep their job and they get to make more money.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentlemen is exactly correct. The minimum wage increase that was passed out of the committee today, $4.65, under that proposal those workers lose their jobs and the ones who keep their jobs are not appreciably better off because the ones who keep their jobs are not the low-income heads of households living in poverty. Under the living wage proposal by Mr. PETRI and myself, in fact no jobs are lost. That worker gets to start on that entry level job and obtains an empowerment to be able to increase that entry level job into a take-home which is substantially above the poverty level. So both the worker wins, society wins; jobs are not only lost but created, and that worker then uses that entry level job as a springboard into the world of work.

Mr. HUNTER. I think it is a tragedy that the working people who are in the process of seeing that first rung on the ladder taken away from them, that working mother who might go in and work as a clerk initially but at some point might be a manager, she might even be one of those hundreds of thousands of Americans who become heads of businesses who started at the bottom rung working at a fairly entry level job. That person, that mother is not having, as I understand it, a say in what the Congress is going to pass on the floor next Tuesday. Is this a case of union leadership in some cases, union bosses, if you will, doing things that are adverse to the interests of at least many working people in this country?

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, it is hard to say what other individuals' motivations are. Or where this bill is coming from. But it is fairly easy to say that an increase in the minimum wage in 1989, when we know better, will put people out of work. It will not help people who are low income heads of households who are living in poverty. It will not help them.

So it does not help anyone. And it hurts 882,000.

I would say to the gentleman in a Texas newspaper just yesterday which I was reading, there was a story which really brought this to home. There was a story of a young welfare mother, literally 24 years old with two kids who never had a job. She decided to make something of herself. She had just obtained a job as a clerk in an optometrist's office, at minimum wage. She has gone in to have her eyes checked and during the course of the examination she told the doctor that she would like to apply for a job sometime.

He called her back about a week later and said that he really did not have, in his words, much of a job, and almost apologized for it. But he told her he did have some things that needed to be done around the office and if she would like to give it a try, he would like to train her. He hired her on an $3.35 an hour. She is working now. It is the first permanent job she ever had in her life. She is not only supporting her family, but she feels a lot better about herself. Her kids are better off. She believes that within a few months she will be making $4 an hour and not long after that $4.50 an hour. She is on the road toward economic freedom providing for herself. One thing she said to the reporter during the interview, she said "I will never go back. It was a horrible trap in which all I did everyday was sit around and watch the soaps and feel sorry for myself. I want a chance to work. I want a chance to be able to make something for myself and provide for my children."

What the minimum wage bill of $4.65 an hour means is that that individual human being would never get that phone call from that doctor's office. He would never call and say, "Well, I have a few things, it is not worth much, but I could start you at $3.35 an hour," because the Government would have said he could not do that. He would have had to start her at $4.65. So he never would have made that initial phone call, frankly. She would have been just plain out of luck. She would have been out of luck because of a political action by Congress, probably by Members of Congress who first of all she had never met and second who, many of them, purported to be speaking for her, but they put her out of work. They left her children in a welfare family with no prospects for the future.

I yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the clarity with which the gentleman has painted this situation which really is a tragic situation.

Last year we passed an omnibus drug bill. In 1986 we passed a similar bill that was aimed at attacking the drug problem from every possible angle, whether we are talking about interdiction, education, jobs, and so forth. We looked at this problem as a national priority.

It is absolutely tragic that just a few months after we passed massive drug legislation, we are on the verge of passing a piece of legislation that will destroy 882,000 jobs, many of which are held by the same youth in America that we are trying to keep out of the drug trap. So these young people who are now going out, learning how to dress, they are learning discipline, they are learning attention to detail, they are learning to show up for work on time, they are learning to take orders from people and they are learning how to be American citizens in the fullest sense; those people, according to Robert R. Nathan, those 882,000, almost a million of them, will now be thrown out of work by the very U.S. Congress which purports to be interested in their welfare.

Is that the sum and substance of this bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is correct.

Let us take a few minutes and go back to examine the cost, the difference in cost to the Federal Government because that is something we always have to consider, the cost to the Federal Government of the living wage proposal versus the minimum wage proposal.

First, the minimum wage proposal. I am going to ask that a letter dated May 13, 1988, from the chairman of the Council on Economic Advisers be inserted in the RECORD at this point, from Beryl Sprinkel.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF ECONOMIC ADVISERS,
Washington, DC, May 13, 1988.

Hon. THOMAS E. PETRI,
House of Representatives, Rayburn Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PETRI: This is in response to your letter of May 4, 1988. You requested the Council's assessment of the effects of legislation to increase the minimum wage on the economy, on the Federal deficit, and on consumers; the effects of minimum wage offsets; and the effects of Earned Income Tax Credit (EITC) reform.

Increasing the minimum wage would have adverse effects on employment, unemployment, economic output, and on the budget deficit. Job losses, estimated to be over 600,000 for a minimum wage of $4.65 per hour, would be concentrated among younger, less skilled, and minority workers. Increasing the Federal minimum wage would do little to help the working poor; under 20 percent of minimum wage workers are poor and many would lose employment. The direct impact on the budget deficit would be $2 billion, due to both increased budget outlays and reduced revenues. American consumers, in addition, would have to absorb roughly $13 billion more in higher costs for the products that minimum wage workers help to produce.

Since the adverse effects of an increase in the minimum wage are roughly proportional to its size, a smaller increase is clearly preferable to a larger one, although the best policy remains no increase at all. The adverse effects could be ameliorated by such offsets as allowing a training wage of 80 percent of the minimum for workers during their first six months of employment; increasing the credit for tip income; and expanding the small business exemption. Altogether, these offsets could eliminate roughly one-half of the damage of an increase in the minimum wage to $3.85 and one-fourth of the damage of an increase to $5.05 per hour.

Alternative proposals would target assistance to families of the working poor more directly. One is an expansion of the EITC, such as you have proposed, which would base the credit on family size. Without the same adverse effects on the economy, and with comparable or even smaller budgetary cost than he proposed increase in the minimum wage, an expanded EITC would target increased income to working heads of larger families below or close to poverty level.

OFFSETS TO MINIMUM WAGE

Table 1 shows estimated job losses due to increases in the minimum wage and mitigating offsets that would likely result from a training wage and from an expanded tip credit and small business exemption. These estimates are uncertain; the ranges are based on alternative assumptions.

The training wage provides the largest potential offsets. It is estimated that as many of 40-percent of young workers may be affected by a 6-month training wage. A shorter duration training wage, such as one available for 3 months, would provide a much smaller offset. The training wage offsets roughly one-fourth of the adverse effects of an increase in the minimum to $4.65; the tip credit offsets 2 percent to 11 percent; the small business exemption would offset 1 percent to 3 percent. Even allowing for the three offsets, more than 400,000 jobs would be lost in raising the minimum to $4.65.

EFFECTS OF INCREASED MINIMUM WAGE AND EXPANDED EITC

Table 2 shows economic effects and budgetary costs of minimum wage increases and EITC expansion. An increase in the minimum wage to $4.65 would entail the loss of more than 600,000 youth jobs and an increase in the unemployment rate for 16-to 19-year-olds of about 3 percentage points. The loss of output due to reduced employment is estimated to cause real gross national product to fall by about $3 billion (in 1982 dollars) and by about $4 billion in 1991 in current dollars. As a result of these direct effects, the Federal deficit would rise by $1.8 billion, with an increase in outlays of $0.8 billion and a loss of $1.0 billion in tax receipts.

In addition to its direct effects, an increase in the minimum wage would impose further damage on the economy and the Federal budget through its indirect effects. Increases in the minimum wage may lead to increases in other wages and prices, resulting in higher inflation. Increased inflation, through its effect on COLAs and interest rates, would raise the cost of entitlement programs and interest payments. If the monetary authorities do not accommodate these increases in inflation, output and employment will be reduced beyond the direct effects of the increase in the minimum wage. Since such indirect effects are critically dependent upon assumptions as to monetary accommodation and inflation impacts, the results are uncertain. Two representative sets of estimates of these indirect effects are presented in Table 2. These estimates indicate that total loss of real gross national product following from an increase in the minimum wage could be four to eight times larger than the direct damage calculated here. Such models, as shown in Table 2, indicate budget deficit increases up to four times higher than estimates based only on direct effects.

Increases in the wages of minimum wage workers who remain employed would need to be absorbed by increases in the relative prices of the products they help to produce. In one form or another, consumers would absorb most of the costs associated with higher wages paid to these workers. For an increase in the minimum wage to $4.65 per hour, the amount of this transfer would be roughly $13 billion. The resulting increase in income for poor families, however, would be less than $3 billion.

Costs to consumers and government due to an increased minimum wage would be more than five times the income gained by poor families. In contrast, the EITC is better targeted toward the working poor; virtually all budget costs are matched by income gains for families with earnings who are either poor or near poor.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the transmittal of this report to the Congress from the standpoint of the Administration's program.

Sincerely,

BERYL W. SPRINKEL.

Enclosures.

TABLE 1.—ESTIMATED JOB LOSSES DUE TO MINIMUM WAGE INCREASES AND OFFSETS (FOR WORKERS 16 TO 24 YEARS OLD)

Minimum wage	$3.85	$4.25	$4.65	$5.05
Job losses (in thousands)	250	450	650	850.
JOB LOSS OFFSETS
Each offset:
Training wage (percent)	35 to 40	33 to 38	25 to 29	21 to 24.
Tip credit (percent)	4 to 17	3 to 14	2 to 11	2 to 9.
Small business exemption (percent)	1 to 3	1 to 3	1 to 3	1 to 3.
Total offsets adjusted for duplication (percent)	39 to 55	36 to 47	27 to 37	23 to 31.
Total job losses allowing for offsets (in thousands)	112 to 153	239 to 288	410 to 475	587 to 655.

Training wage: Employers would be allowed to pay 80 percent of minimum wage to workers for the first 6 months on any job. (Exception is that training wage would not be set below current minimum wage of $3.35 per hour.)
Tip credit: Allowed tip credit would be increased from the current 40 percent of minimum wage to 50 percent. This would reduce the effective minimum wage for many food services jobs.
Small business exemption: Increase in exemption for retail and service establishment from the current $362,500 in annual sales to $500,000.

Mr. Sprinkel was asked by Mr. PETRI precisely what the budget impact of a $4.65 minimum wage would be on the Federal budget. His conclusion was that it would first have a $2 billion per year impact on direct Federal expenditures.

Now, what that means is that there are employers who are paying the minimum wage or just above the minimum wage for those entry level jobs who would be required to increase their pay for the jobs that they kept or decreased the productivity for the ones that they did not. Those direct Federal programs alone, nursing homes, child care centers, Head Start programs, college work studies, those direct Federal programs alone would have an immediate first-year impact of $2 billion per year of an increase in Federal expenditures. In addition to that he calculated that American consumers would have to absorb roughly a $13 billion increase in higher costs for products that minimum wage workers help to produce. If you take that $13 billion a year increase and the resulting inflation, he further calculated that the Federal deficit would rise by an additional $1.8 billion because of the loss of tax receipts and an increase in outlays. He made some other calculations.

I want to suggest to the Congress that the Congress consider what will not be considered next Tuesday because we do not have the report out of CBO that would detail these and the bill is on such a fast track there will not be enough time to get it detailed. But the Congress needs to consider that if we pass the minimum wage increase to $4.65 a hour, the cost to the Federal Treasury will be, therefore, somewhat between $3.8 billion a year, and, according to Beryl Sprinkel, $5.8 billion a year. So it is somewhere between $3 billion and $6 billion per year.

That is the cost of the minimum wage increase, substantial cost to the Federal budget. The living wage increase, on the other hand, it does not pass through any cost. It does not suck up any kind of administrative program to decide what jobs are going to be paid. It only says that if a worker is working at a lower income level, $4, $5, $6 or in that area per hour, and if that worker has dependents, children or other dependents, then the worker will be entitled to a direct Federal income tax credit on their take-home pay. All the living wage proposal says if the Federal Government believes that it is in society's best interest that low-income heads of households receive a higher income for their wages, then the Federal Government ought to be willing to pay for it. That direct empowerment would cost the Federal Treasury, on a net basis, only $3 billion per year. That is a lot of money, but I want to remind my colleagues that that is less than what it would cost under the minimum wage proposal, No. 1, and the effects of it are absolutely astounding, because consider for a momemt the effect that we would have on society in our economy if we empowered every low-income worker or potential worker in America, each of those 20 million American who are living under the poverty level, if we empowered every one of them to go to work and to see a boost in their take-home pay, in their direct weekly income of the size that is envisioned here. Imagine the enormous positive impact on the economy of telling mothers or fathers who have children that they can go to work for $4 an hour and to earn the equivalent of between $5 and $6 an hour, and thus they would be induced to go to work. My own belief is that if this implemented, it would have such an impact on people's lives and their choices to go back to work that, in fact, it might, the $3 billion estimate per year, might in fact be way off and it might not cost anything at all, or it might cost substantially less, but at the moment it would cost a total of $3 billion per year in direct impact on the Federal budget.

Now there is another bill being considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and I want to call the House's attention to it because it says some of the same things, but it is radically different. It is introduced by the gentleman from New York who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and he calls his the living wage, but his living wage bears no relationship to the Petri living wage, and it also bears some relationship but very little. It does expand the earned income tax credit for dependent size. But then after it does that, it would expand it by such a large amount, and then it would add in a whole new section of the bill of creating a new welfare system to say to the people whether they worked or not, the Federal Government would send them a check, and thus puts them back on welfare through an expansion of title 20 of Human Services. The facts in that bill, it is estimated would cost $34 billion over a 5-year period. I am suggesting that that is a step in the wrong direction. It is more than is needed and, in fact, it would be counterproductive. For $3 billion a year, we can put low-income workers who are supporting their families, back to work. We can guarantee that they will be able to get that first job. We can create jobs and will make sure there are permanent jobs that will give them a chance to work their way out of poverty and to become working, productive members of society and support their families.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman again for his very clear and concise description of what would happen under the living wage. For Members who have not been watching until the last couple of minutes, could the gentleman simply explain, going back to that unmarried or that married mother of two who is working at an entry level wage, and have an earned income tax credit, how that will put more money into her paycheck under the living wage, than if she were subject to current levels.

Mr. BARTLETT. Under the living wage bill, for a working mother with two children, if she was earning $4 an hour in the marketplace, which means she could get that first job, her $4 in the marketplace with two children would convert to the equivalent of $5.32 an hour in take-home pay.

Mr. HUNTER. How does that come about?

Mr. BARTLETT. It comes about because the bill would say that in addition to her paycheck, we are going to refund the taxes that she is paying, not only her income taxes which are probably minimal, if anything, but her FICA taxes, which is 15 percent of her total payroll that the employer and the employee pays. Right now that mother of two is paying a very regressive hidden tax that is taken out of her paycheck at the source, of a little over 7 percent that she pays directly and a little over 7 percent that her employee pays into FICA. What this would say as we calculate up to $700 a year for preschool child and give her a tax credit against that 15 percent payroll tax that she is otherwise paying, and thus her buying power for her earning power is immediately enhanced to the point she is no longer in the poverty level, but she has the job.

Mr. HUNTER. Let me ask if the gentleman is saying this mother of two at the end of her payday, let us say she is paid every day instead of getting $32 at $4 an hour for eight hours, she will get an actual paycheck substantially above that?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct.

Mr. HUNTER. Approximately how much?

Mr. BARTLETT. It would be the equivalent of $5.23 an hour if she were being employed.

I would have to calculate it directly, but we will insert that into the RECORD.

Mr. HUNTER. That is a little over $41.50.

Mr. BARTLETT. About $41 a day, giving a direct incentive to work. The minimum wage just puts her out of work.

Mr. HUNTER. So instead of getting $32 a day, she will get $41 a day and also have a job?

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct, under increase of minimum wage, she would be more likely to lose her job in the first place, and even if she did not, she would not be better off, frankly, than where she is today.

Under a living wage proposal, she would be substantially better off than where she is today. When she moves up to the $5 an hour range, it gets even better, and up in the $6 an hour, if she has more children. She would be earning the equivalent of $6 an hour.

Let me conclude by saying that the choice that Congress needs to make is a choice that the country is ready to make. It is a choice of difference between a minimum wage, the old way of doing things, the way of doing things rooted somewhere in the 1930's, the way of doing things of being able to make speeches to say we help people, but not only not helping them, but hurting them, an increase in the minimum wage would put them out of work and not help appreciably those persons who are poverty level, even the ones who keep their job versus a living wage proposal, a living wage in which low-income working persons receive a living wage for their efforts without a loss of jobs, but merely by saying that they would be entitled to a direct tax credit of the taxes, of the regressive taxes that they are paying. It is a difference between a job and no job. It is a difference between an income in which one can support your family or an income which you cannot. It is a difference between common sense and old style politics. It is a difference between compassion and politics.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my colleagues, Mr. PETRI and Mr. BARTLETT, for their leadership in sponsoring this special order on the Family Living Wage Act of 1989. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of that legislation, which seeks to increase the earned income tax credit [EITC] and vary it by family size so that a low income family's wages may be supplemented according to need.

I have spoken out in support of an expanded EITC before because I believe that proposal provides a unique tool to help our Nation's working poor. The EITC gives back to low-income families some of the taxes that are automatically taken out in payroll deductions, so that a larger percentage of salary ends up as take-home pay. The EITC accomplishes the same end result as an increased wage by allowing low wage workers to keep more of what they earn.

For numerous reasons, raising the minimum wage would not be the best way to aid the working poor. Study after study shows that only a very low percentage of workers at or immediately above the minimum wage are from poverty households. Economists at the Congressional Budget Office have estimated that among those paid $3.35 in March 1985, only 18.5 percent were in families below the poverty level. For the less than 20 percent of the minimum wage earners who are in poverty households, let us assist them without destroying the whole economy. Large and continuing increases to the minimum wage will cause too many workers to lose their jobs or lose job opportunities, as well as create inflationary pressures as minimum wage increases are likely to be followed by like percentage increases in higher parts of the wage structure to maintain skill differentials.

The Family Living Wage Act not only increases work incentives for welfare families and low-income wage earners, but also assists those families with the costs of child care, independently of whether others are paid to provide care or one family member forgoes income in order to provide care. As you know, currently the largest single source of Federal support for child care services is the child and dependent care tax credit which is not available to the lowest income families.

Thus, instead of following an approach that would spawn huge and continuing increases in the minimum wage, let us instead provide targeted assistance through the Family Living Wage Act, which clearly offers a mechanism for putting more money into the pockets of low-wage workers and provides child care assistance to those families. In expressing suport of an expanded EITC last year, a New York Times editorial noted, "Congress owes the working poor well-designed help, not a well-intentioned illusion" like continuing increases in the minimum wage. I urge my distinguished colleagues in Congress to support Mr. PETRI's Family Living Wage Act as an effective alternative to continuing increases in the minimum wage.

In closing, I should like to share with you the following column from the New York Times of March 11, 1989:

[The article follows:]

[From the New York Times, Mar. 1, 1989]

ECONOMIC SCENE—A BREAKTHROUGH ON POVERTY?

(By Peter Passell)

Could this be the year Congress comes to the aid of the working poor?

While Washington remains divided on the best way to assure a decent living for everyone who punches a time clock, key political players do seem ready to accept a hefty increase in Federal wage subsidies for poor families supporting children. The tough question is whether this apparent consensus, as yet unacknowledged, can survive infighting over budget priorities.

Both liberals and conservatives have long counted on jobs as the universal antidote to poverty. But their faith has been shaken by evidence from the last few decades. Though average real family incomes have risen by 17 percent since 1973, over five million working Americans and their families still live below the poverty line.

One reason is that income gaps have widened between young and old, unskilled and skilled. Blue-collar workers under 35 have borne the brunt of the disappearance of $10-an-hour jobs in heavy industry. And tighter eligibility requirements have reduced government medical and food benefits available to the marginally employed.

The fix favored by traditional liberals is to insist that employers pay a living wage. Simply restoring the purchasing power of the Federal minimum wage to the 1981 level, they note, would increase the income of the poorest workers by a third.

The catch is that any mandated increase in labor costs would reduce total employment. By almost everyone's estimate, the poor as a group would come out ahead: the gain for those earning the higher minimum wage would exceed the loss to workers priced out of the market.

But there would also be winners among part-time workers from middle-income families who have no special claim to a larger slice of the economic pie. And many of the losers would be school dropouts under 25—arguably those in greatest need of work to escape the underclass.

The stalemate over the minimum wage shows no signs of breaking. But hope for the working poor is coming from an unexpected and seemingly unrelated source: the day-care lobby.

One mother in two with a preschool child is now in the labor market, and the pressure for government aid for day care is growing. Democrats, led by Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, propose to help states to set up child-support systems and to subsidize their use by the poor. Republicans are eager to share the credit for a day-care fix, but they are reluctant to extend the power of the Federal bureaucracy. And they face bitter opposition from the party's right wing to any program that both encourages mothers to enter the job market and denies financing to church groups.

That is where child-care tax credits fit in. President Bush would give up to $1,000 per child in cash or credits to low-income families to offset the cost of raising preschoolers. But the money need not be spent on care outside the family—indeed, there would be no obligation to spend it on day care at all. The program is nothing more (or less) than a wage supplement to the working poor burdened by the costs of raising children.

Seeing the political opening created by the President's "day care" plan, two pragmatic Representatives have pounced. Democrat Thomas J. Downey of New York and Republican Thomas E. Petri of Wisconsin are offering their own versions, extending eligibility to all low-income people with dependent children.

Of the two, the Petri approach is more sharply targeted. He drops the pretense that the cash is meant for day care, and simply expands the tax credit already paid to low-income workers to offset the burden of child-rearing. Credits per child would range up to $700, with a maximum benefit of $3,850 for a family with four young children and an earned income of just $7,000.

The Downey plan would maintain the legal distinction between wage subsidies and tax credits for child care. But it would add roughly the same amount to the income of large families earning less than $10,000. Both men seem prepared to compromise on packaging to win votes.

Mr. Downey has the support of Dan Rostenkowski, powerful chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. And neither advocates of a higher minimum wage nor those of Dodd-style day care are likely to hold wage subsidies hostage to their own goals. But there remains one potent sticking point: financing.

None of the plans are particularly expensive by Washington standards. The Downey approach would cost about $8 billion—4 cents to every dollar spent on Social Security. Mr. Petri would deliver roughly the same benefits at half the net cost because he would eliminate credits for child care now going to upper-income families.

But President Bush has already been heavily criticized for offering spending proposals without explaining how he would pay for them. And Mr. Downey's financing idea, a five-percentage-point tax increase (to 33 percent) for families with incomes exceeding $208,000, has met with a chilly response from the tax-writing committees. Thus to increase wage subsidies this year, politicians who care about the working poor will have to put their necks on the line.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, the Family Living Wage Act, H.R. 1104, is designed to achieve several goals. Its objectives are to supplement wages according to need, as determined by family size, to help people support families by working rather than on welfare, and in particular to help with the costs of child care, which are heaviest for preschool children. But the initial reason I got into this whole area was my efforts to analyze the minimum wage for the past 2 years, I have been trying to focus, and to get others to focus, on the basic purpose that minimum wage legislation is supposed to serve. The basic purpose is not to increase the minimum wage for its own sake. The basic purpose is to fight poverty.

Specifically, the purpose is to enable low skilled people to support families by working. And we owe it to our constituents to figure out as honestly as we can how to serve that purpose best.

It turns out, when you really look at it that a minimum wage is an extremely crude tool for fighting poverty.

That's partly because poverty is actually increased by two of its effects, namely inflation and the loss of thousands of entry level jobs that help those with the lowest skills get started in the labor force. It's partly because 80 percent of those who are helped by minimum wage increases are not poor.

But it's mainly because millions of those who are poor and are working, are not helped. They already earn, or are capable of earning, more than $4.65 per hour but are still poor because of their larger family sizes.

The problem is that poverty is not a fixed target. Economic need and poverty lines vary by family size. But wages, including any particular minimum wage, do not. A full time job at the current minimum wage brings a single person about a thousand dollars over the poverty line. It brings a single parent with one child to his or her poverty line after the current earned income tax credit is added and Social Security taxes are subtracted. But it leaves larger families $1,900 further short of the poverty line for each additional family member.

Even a $4.65 minimum wage won't bring families larger than three out of poverty.

What people need is not a minimum wage but a living wage.

And the best way to get it is to supplement wages directly, according to need as determined by family size, through a reform of the existing earned income tax credit. The Family Living Wage Act would provide a direct supplement equivalent to $2.08 per hour to a family head with four young children earning $4 per hour, for a total effective wage of $6.08.

If the same family head earned $5 per hour, he'd still get a supplement equivalent to an additional wage of $1.90 per hour, for a total of $6.90. If he earned $6 per hour in the labor market, his supplement would be equivalent to $1.71, for a total of $7.71. And so on.

For a family head with two young children, the supplement to a $4 wage would be equivalent to an extra $1.32, that for a $5 wage would be an extra $1.18, that for a $6 wage would be an extra $1.04, and so on.

Moreover, these supplements are fully indexed for inflation, and workers can receive them in their regular paychecks.

If anyone takes an honest look at the numbers I believe it is clear that this approach does far more to help the working poor than does a big increase in the minimum wage, and it does it without causing inflation or job losses that actually hurt the poor. I intend to keep arguing for this approach at every opportunity, and I am happy that the New York Times, many other papers and columnists, most economists and many Members of Congress from both sides of the aisle agree with it.

I know some Members who support the Family Living Wage Act disagree with me on the extent to which it should be combined with an increase in the minimum wage.

But as all of us concerned with this area of public policy continue to discuss how best to fight poverty through the workplace, I hope we will come increasingly to concentrate our efforts on this, the most promising approach.

At this point,

I would like to insert in the RECORD testimony I gave at the Ways and Means Committee on February 28.

TESTIMONY OF THOMAS E. PETRI

Mr. Chairman and other members of the committee, I appreciate very much the opportunity to discuss with you today the question of how to help our nation's working poor or near-poor families. At the outset, let me state my agreement that people should be able to make more money working than they can receive on welfare. Beyond that, it would be nice if no one who worked was poor, but that is a more ambitious goal. I'd like to discuss briefly the nature of the basic problem I think this hearing is meant to address, and then outline some general principles for addressing it.

The basic problem is that economic need and therefore welfare payments vary by family size but work skills and therefore wages do not. Our official definition of poverty, the so-called poverty line, starts out at about $5,500 annual income for a single person and adds about $1,900 more for each additional member of the family. Basic AFDC and food stamp benefits are also geared to the number of people in the family but generally provide somewhat less than a poverty level income. In Wisconsin, last year these benefits amounted to $8,004 for a three person family, versus a poverty line of about $9,300, $9,576 for a four person family versus a poverty line of about $11,200, and $10,980 for a five person family versus a poverty line of $13,000.

Now consider how various types of family incomes compare to these poverty levels if the bread winners work at low wage jobs. A full time job at the current minimum wage pays $6,968 per year, minus social security taxes of $523, for a net of $6,445. So even such a low paying job puts a single person almost $1,000 over the poverty line.

Next consider two person households. Their poverty line is about $7,400 in annual income. If both persons are adults, there is the potential for two incomes and the household is likely to be far from poor. If the household consists of a single parent with one child, the parent is eligible to receive about $900 from the current law earned income tax credit this year; thus bringing his or her net income from even a minimum wage job to within about $50 of the poverty line for two people. Since labor market forces in most parts of the country are pulling wages above the federally mandated minimum even for very low skilled workers with little experience, in general we can say that working single parents of only one child are not poor either, at least according to the official definition.

The real problem of disparities between earnings from low skilled jobs and welfare payments or poverty level income occurs in larger families—single parent families with two or more children and two parent families with three or more children. And the larger the family, the worse the problem.

Exclusive of child care costs, a Wisconsin single mother of two working full time at the minimum wage would take home, after figuring in her earned income tax credit to about $650 less per year than she could get from AFDC and food stamps, add about $1,950 less than the poverty level for her family. If she had three children, she'd make about $2,200 less than on welfare and $3,850 less than the poverty level. If she had four children, she'd make about $3,600 less than on welfare and $5,750 less than the poverty level. Put another way, to match AFDC and food stamp benefits, she would have to earn $3.70 per hour if she has two children, $4.53 if she has three children, and $5.29 if she has four. To reach the poverty level, she'd have to make $4.40, $5.43 and $6.46 per hour in three cases, respectively.

Mr. Chairman, both you and I have recently introduced bills designed to alleviate these problems through direct wage supplements varied according to economic need and achieved by adjusting the current earned income tax credit for the number of children in the family. I think your bill is a step in the right direction, and I hope you hold a similar view of mine. As the Ways and Means Committee considers these issues further and moves toward final legislation, as I hope it will, I suggest that it apply several basic principles.

First, because the basic problem is greatest for larger families, any adjustment of the EITC for family size should not stop at two children. Of the 34 million families with any children in our country, almost 8 million have three or more. Those are the families that need the most help. Their poverty lines are higher, and they make up a disproportionate share of families caught in "welfare traps" or fitting the description, "working but still poor." In order to cover most of these families more adequately, we ought to provide additional EITC amounts per child for up to at least four children, not two.

Second, I think it would be better policy to focus all available dollars on expanded EITC amounts, rather than spend any on the dependent care credit. In the first place, most very low income workers simply do not pay large amounts for child care, if they pay anything at all, and so derive little benefit from the dependent care credit. The vast majority of them would be better off if the same dollars were distributed through the EITC instead. In the second place, I would argue that it is fairer to provide help for people with children independent of whether or not the parents pay someone else for child care services. The need to look after those children impose an economic cost on someone, often in the form of income forgone, regardless of whether dollars change hands. It seems to me that society, through the tax code, should be neutral as to the form of care provided rather than subsidizing only one kind and forcing parents into paid care in order to reap benefits.

We may have trouble providing sufficient EITC increments per child to provide substantial help to those very low income parents who do have to pay others large sums for child care. As a compromise, I suggest providing increments for preschool children that are twice as great as those for school age children. While there are many different costs associated with raising all children, the need to look after them is surely one of the largest and it is far larger for preschoolers. On those grounds, a larger wage supplement for preschool than for school age children could be well justified.

If we follow these basic principles, I think we can come up with a strong wage supplement program that enables far more people to make more working than they could receive on welfare, and that brings many of them over the poverty line. Within the dollars likely to be available, I am not sure we will be able to accomplish these two goals for everyone, but we can go a long way in that direction.

In fact, I like to think of this as welfare reform, round II. It moves toward the principle that everyone's basic source of income should be whatever he or she can earn by working, and then if society decides that is not enough, society should supplement those earnings directly according to need as determined by family size.

In this respect, I would like to leave you with one final thought. Insofar as this kind of policy should help some people move off welfare, wholly or in part, and into the labor force, it should enable us to reap significant welfare savings. However, as you know, the Congressional Budget Office is reluctant to score any such savings for budget purposes. It seems to me that it is in the interest of all of us who are working for such policies to keep working on coming up with some kind of basis on which their true budget effects can be more realistically scored. That will in turn give us more budget dollars to work with in our attempts to help the working poor.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE U.S. ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT AGENCY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OLIN) laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit the 1988 Report of the United States Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. It reviews all aspects of last year's arms control policies, negotiating efforts, and the activities conducted in the process of meeting the statutory requirements of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, as amended.

Of special interest are the sections on conventional arms control, the implementation of the INF Treaty, Nuclear Testing Talks, and the chemical weapons ban. The role of verification, a crucial element in any arms control agreement, is highlighted throughout the report.

The INF Treaty is a significant step in the quest for arms reductions. Reaching agreements with the Soviet Union on a START Treaty and a conventional arms control treaty are important objectives. We must also seek solutions to the serious problems of nuclear and chemical weapons proliferation.

While I endorse the broad approach to arms control taken in the past year, I am still reviewing specific details of the U.S. negotiating position. Statements of Administration views in the attached report, therefore, should be considered to be authoritative statements of past positions that may be subject to future modification following review.

I strongly believe that arms control should play a significant role in enhancing the security of the United States and its allies. The United States will continue to work toward effectively verifiable and stabilizing arms reductions.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 14, 1989.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PETRI] is recognized for 60 minutes.

ENHANCING AMERICA'S COMPETITIVENESS BY HELPING AMERICANS ABROAD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced three bills that if enacted into law and taken together will help make our Nation more competitive in international trade, thereby resulting in an expansion of U.S. exports, thus reducing the trade deficit and ultimately strengthening our economy and making America a healthier nation economically.

Over many years of working to expand American exports, I have come to understand that the American citizen living abroad is the most vital link in the export chain.

Under the best of circumstances, it is difficult to uproot your family and move to a faraway land where the language, the customs, and the economy are all very different from those in the United States.

Just as Government encouraged the pioneers who settled the West, Government should now do more to encourage export pioneers to move to outposts on the frontier of the new global economy.

Unfortunately, our laws now discourage Americans from moving abroad, and needlessly hasten the return of experienced Americans who now live abroad and work to expand markets for American goods and services.

The first, and most important, is entitled "the Overseas U.S. Citizens' Represenstation in the Congress Act." This bill would establish a nonvoting delegate to the House to represent Americans abroad.

Under the bill, registered voters living in foreign countries would have the option of voting in the election for the nonvoting delegate or voting in the election in their home congressional district.

A three-member Presidential commission, guided by the provisions of the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voters Act, would determine procedures for election of the delegate.

The unique problems and concerns of Americans abroad have too often gone unconsidered by the Congress because these nearly 3 million Americans—constituting a population larger than that of 22 States—have no voice in Congress. Frankly, none of us in this House represents enough Americans abroad to realize a political advantage from the overseas vote.

For there part, Americans abroad often do not participate in the political process, despite all they have at stake. These Americans feel cut off and adrift from domestic politics; correspondence I have received on this issue indicates that many cannot even identify their home Member of Congress.

A nonvoting delegate for Americans abroad, similar to the delegates now representing the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and Guam, would be able to devote full time and attention—as none of the rest of us can—to the issues affecting overseas Americans.

The second bill, entitled "the Overseas American Children's Human Rights Act," would make it easier for Americans abroad who marry aliens to pass American citizenship to their children.

Under current law, if an American citizen marries a foreign national and lives outside the United States, that citizen is required to have physically resided in the United States for 5 years, at least two of which were after the age of 14, for his or her child to become an American citizen at birth.

However, children born out of wedlock to an American abroad now become citizens at birth if the U.S. citizen parent has physically resided in the United States for 1 year in the aggregate.

While we promote the institution of the family we tolerate a law blatantly antifamily. It discriminates in favor of those Americans abroad who enter into parenthood with a foreign partner without benefit of marriage. My bill would corect this injustice by applying the 1-year residency requirement to all U.S. citizens abroad who become parents, no matter what the circumstances of the child's birth.

The legislation would also provide that children born to Americans abroad will automatically become citizens at birth if they would otherwise be born stateless.

As a result, American law would conform with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Declaration of the Rights of the Child—both of which the United States helped draft and both of which pledge that persons have a right to a name and a nationality at birth.

My bill would also insert the term "natural born" into section 301 of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, thus clearing up any question as to whether a child born abroad as an American citizen qualifies under the Constitution to run for President when he or she grows up.

The third bill I introduce today, the Overseas Americans Economic Competition Enhancement Act, would amend section 911 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to return America to the residency based tax system that existed prior to 1962.

The United States is the only nation on Earth that taxes its citizens based on their citizenship rather than on the basis of their nation of residence.

All other nations, including our major trading competitors, tax everyone living within their borders but do not tax their own citizens who live abroad.

As a result, American citizens who live abroad face an intolerable burden of double taxation—they pay U.S. taxes and taxes to the nation in which they reside.

Citizenship-based taxation discourages American companies from hiring American citizens to work abroad. And, it enforces competitive disadvantages on American entrepreneurs who wish to set up companies abroad. If we're serious about expanding exports, there is no justification for preserving these barriers to commerce.

We should encourage Americans to live abroad. As "USA Citizens Abroad: A Handbook," prepared for USA Today by American Citizens Abroad, put it, "we need military people abroad to defend our Nation and our allies; we need Foreign Service personnel to advance the interests of our Government and assist other Americans abroad; we need businesspeople abroad who promote American exports; and we need teachers, scholars and artists abroad to spread an appreciation of American culture and bring back the best of what they have learned from other cultures."

I invite all Members to join me in supporting these three bills. By doing so, you will help encourage Americans abroad to help their country.

H.R. 1378

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Overseas United States Citizens' Representation in the Congress Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. CREATION OF OFFICE OF DELEGATE FOR UNITED STATES CITIZENS ABROAD.

United States citizens residing outside the United States shall be represented in the Congress by a nonvoting Delegate to the House of Representatives (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Delegate"), who shall be elected in accordance with this Act.

SEC. 3. QUALIFICATIONS OF ELECTORS; COMMENCEMENT OF TERM OF OFFICE.

(a) QUALIFICATIONS OF ELECTORS.—The Delegate shall be elected by citizens described in section 107(5) (B) or (C) of the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (42 U.S.C. 1973ff-6(5) (B) or (C)) who have the right to register absentee for, and to vote by, an absentee ballot in Federal elections under such Act and who individually exercise the options to relinquish such right with respect to the offices in the House of Representatives specified in section 107(3) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 1973ff-6(3)).

(b) COMMENCEMENT OF TERM OF OFFICE.—The term of the Delegate shall commence on the third day of January following the date of the election.

SEC. 4. QUALIFICATIONS OF DELEGATE.

To be eligible for the office of Delegate, a candidate shall—

(1) be at least 25 years of age on the date of the election;

(2) not be, on the date of the election, a candidate for any other office;

(3) have been a citizen of the United States for at least seven years prior to the date of the election;

(4) have resided outside the United States for the six-month period ending on the date of the election; and

(5) be qualified to vote for the office of Delegate under section 2(a).

SEC. 5. PRESIDENTIAL COMMISSION.

A three-member commission, appointed by the President, shall determine the procedures and regulations for election to the office of Delegate, the method by which a special election to fill a vacancy in such office shall be conducted, the method by which ties between candidates for such office shall be resolved, the order of names on the ballot for such office, and all other matters pertaining to the office of Delegate not otherwise provided for in this Act.

SEC. 6. COMPENSATION OF DELEGATE.

Until the Rules of the House of Representatives are amended to provide otherwise, the Delegate shall receive the same compensation, allowances, and benefits as a Member of the House of Representatives, and shall be entitled to whatever privileges and immunities that are, or hereafter may be, granted to the Delegate from Guam.

SEC. 7. DEFINITION.

As used in this Act, the term "United States", when used in the geographical sense, has the meaning given such term in section 107 of the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act (2 U.S.C. 1973ff-6).

SEC. 8. EFFECTIVE DATE.

This Act shall apply with respect to elections beginning with the first general election held after the year in which this Act is enacted.

H.R. 1379

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Overseas American Economic Competition Enhancement Act of 1989".

SEC. 2 EXCLUSION OF INCOME OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS AND RESIDENTS ABROAD.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 911 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to citizens or residents of the United States living abroad) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 911. INCOME EARNED ABROAD BY UNITED STATES CITIZENS AND RESIDENTS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—In the case of an individual described in subsection (b), the following items shall be excluded from gross income and exempt from taxation under this subtitle:

"(1) FOREIGN EARNED INCOME.—Amounts received from sources within a foreign country or countries which constitute earned income attributable to services performed during that portion of the taxable year for which the taxpayer meets the requirements of subsection (b).

"(2) UNITED STATES EARNED INCOME ATTRIBUTABLE TO TEMPORARY PRESENCE.—Compensation for labor or personal services described in section 861(a)(3)(C) performed in the United States by such an individual while temporarily present in the United States for a period or periods not exceeding a total of 183 days during the taxable year, received during that portion of the taxable year for which the taxpayer meets the requirements of subsection (b).

"(3) OTHER FOREIGN INCOME.—Income (other than compensation for labor personal services) from sources without the United States (within the meaning of section 862) received during that portion of the taxable year for which the taxpayer meets the requirements of subsection (b).

"(4) OTHER UNITED STATES INCOME NOT EFFECTIVELY CONNECTED WITH A UNITED STATES TRADE OR BUSINESS.—Amounts received from sources within the United States described in subparagraph (A), (B), (C), or (D) of section 871(a)(1), but only to the extent the amounts so received are not effectively connected with the conduct of a trade or business within the United States (within the meaning of section 871), received during that portion of the taxable year for which the taxpayer meets the requirements of subsection (b).

"(5) UNITED STATES CAPITAL GAIN NET INCOME DURING TEMPORARY PRESENCE.—Capital gain net income (determined in accordance with the second sentence of section 871(a)(2)) of such an individual while temporarily present in the United States for a period or periods not exceeding a total of 183 days during the taxable year, received during that portion of the taxable year for which the taxpayer meets the requirements of subsection (b), to the extent that such income—

"(A) is allocable to sources within the United States, and

"(B) is not effectively connected with the conduct of a trade or business within the United States.

"(6) UNITED STATES REAL PROPERTY INTEREST GAIN.—Gain from the disposition of a United States real property interest (as defined in section 897(c)) received during that portion of the taxable year for which the taxpayer meets the requirements of subsection (b).

For purposes of paragraph (6) and section 897, gain or loss from the disposition of a United States real property interest (as defined in section 897(c)) shall be determined under section 897 in the case of an individual described in subsection (b), applied as if the individual were described in section 897(a)(1)(A).

"(b) ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS.—Subsection (a) applies only in the case of—

"(1) an individual who is a citizen of the United States and who establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary that he has been a bona fide resident of a foreign country or countries for an uninterrupted period which includes an entire taxable year, or

"(2) an individual who is a citizen or resident of the United States and who, during any period of 18 consecutive months, is present in a foreign country or countries during at least 510 full days in such period.

"(c) DEFINITIONS; SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) EARNED INCOME.—The term 'earned income' means wages, salaries or professional fees, and other amounts received as compensation for personal services actually rendered, but does not include that part of the compensation derived by the taxpayer for personal services rendered by the taxpayer to a corporation which represents a distribution of earnings or profits rather than a reasonable allowance as compensation for the personal services actually rendered. In the case of a taxpayer engaged in a trade or business in which both personal services and capital are material income-producing factors, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, a reasonable allowance as compensation for the personal services rendered by the taxpayer, not in excess of 30 percent of the taxpayer's share of the net profits of such trade or business, shall be considered as earned income.

"(2) ATTRIBUTION TO YEAR IN WHICH SERVICES ARE PERFORMED.—Amounts received that constitute earned income shall be considered received in the taxable year in which the services to which the amounts are attributable are performed.

"(3) REQUIREMENT AS TO TIME OF RECEIPT.—Amounts received after the close of the taxable year in which the services to which the amounts are attributable are performed shall be excluded under subsection (a) without regard to the taxable year in which they are received.

"(4) DEDUCTIONS AND CREDITS ATTRIBUTABLE TO EXCLUDED INCOME NOT DEDUCTIBLE OR CREDITABLE.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this chapter, no deduction (other than the deduction allowed by section 217 (relating to moving expenses)) or credit against the tax imposed by this chapter shall be allowed under this title to the extent that such deduction or credit is properly allocable to or chargeable against amounts excluded from gross income under this section.

"(5) CERTAIN AMOUNTS NOT EXCLUDABLE.—

"(A) UNITED STATES SOURCE PENSION AND ANNUITY INCOME; INCOME FROM CERTAIN NONQUALIFIED TRUSTS AND ANNUTIES.—No amount may be excluded under subsection (a) which is—

"(i) received as a pension or annuity, or

"(ii) included in gross income by reason of section 402(b) (relating to taxability of beneficiary of nonexempt trust) or section 403(c) (relating to taxability of beneficiary under a nonqualified annuity).

"(B) EXCEPTIONS.—Subparagraph (A) shall not apply to—

"(i) so much of any amounts received as a pension or annuity as is attributable to personal service rendered outside the United States during periods for which the taxpayer met the requirements of subsection (b), or

"(ii) amounts received or otherwise includible in gross income under a foreign pension, annuity, or trust (except to the extent that such amounts are attributable to personal service rendered within the United States, other than personal service described in subsection (a)(2)).

"(d) WAIVER OF PERIOD OF STAY IN FOREIGN COUNTRY.—For purposes of subsection (b), an individual who—

"(1) for any period is a bona fide resident of or is present in a foreign country,

"(2) leaves such foreign country—

"(A) during any period during which the Secretary determines, after consultation with the Secretary of State, that individuals were required to leave such foreign country because of war, civil unrest, or similar adverse conditions in such foreign country which precluded the normal conduct of business by such individuals, and

"(B) before the requirements of section (b), and

"(3) establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary that he could reasonably have been expected to have met such requirements but for the conditions described in paragraph (2), shall be treated as having met such requirements with respect to the period described in paragraph (1) during which he was a bona fide resident or present in the foreign country.".

(b) Conforming and Clerical Amendments.—

(1) Cross-references to earned income definition.—

(A) Sections 1(i)(4)(A), 79(d)(3)(B), 89(h)(1)(F), 105(h)(3)(v), 162(k)(7)(B), 410(b)(3)(C), 414(p)(8)(F), and 879(a)(1) of such Code are each amended by striking out "section 911(d)(2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 911(c)(1)".

(B) Paragraph (1) of section 66(d) of such Code is amended by striking out "section 911(b)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 911(c)(1)".

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

GOVERNMENT GONE CRAZY

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, recently I read an article in Nation's Business regarding the controversial section 89 provisions of the Federal Tax Code and the implications this will have for small business. I want to share this excellent article with my colleagues in an effort to point out how Government has, once again, gone too far in regulating business. Government efforts to micromanage will lead many businesses to offer fewer benefits, or offer no benefits at all. Once again, Congress has succeeded in destroying precisely that which we sought to promote, through policies based on overregulation, complex law, and preemption of marketplace demands.

[From the Nation's Business, February 1989]

"GOVERNMENT GONE CRAZY"

(By Roger Thompson)

It was the end of another long day for Steven Ferruggia, whose mastery of a new, perversely complex federal benefits law has generated more consulting business than he can comfortably handle. His students—42 business owners, benefits managers, lawyers, and consultants—had paid $195 apiece for an all-day workshop at Boston's Logan Airport Hilton. Participants had flown in from across New England and from as far away as Houston.

Ferruggia and two colleagues from New York-based Buck Consultants performed feats of verbal alchemy, laying out in clear English what Congress had cloaked in turgid prose. But no amount of explaining would relieve the sense of quiet desperation that pervaded the room. Puzzled looks and furrowed brows revealed by expression what went unspoken: This time, Congress had gone too far.

"I think this law will cause a lot of small employers to dump their benefit plans," Ferruggia said in a private moment after the workshop. "It's big government gone crazy," said Edward Maguire, a consultant with Sapers & Wallack in Cambridge, Mass.

The law in question is Section 89 of the federal tax code, one of several provisions that affect employee benefits and were added by the 1986 Tax Reform Act but were not effective until Jan. 1, 1989. Section 89 sets stiff tax penalties for employer-paid health insurance, life insurance, and other nonpension employee benefit plans that favor higher-paid workers.

Businesses that discriminate in favor of higher-paid workers have two choices: broaden and/or extend coverage to lower-paid workers or report the "discriminatory" portion of the higher-paid workers' benefits as taxable income.

Also effective Jan. 1 was another tax-law change that, while it has not drawn as much criticism as Section 89, could prove no less burdensome to some employers. The change requires employer-provided retirement plans—including pension, profit-sharing, and so-called 401(k) savings plans—to meet rigid tests for fairness to workers who are not in the "highly paid" category defined in the law. Failure to comply with minimum coverage and participation requirements could result in loss of tax-favored status for both the plan sponsor and the plan participants. (See box on Page 24.)

Taken together, the new requirements imposed by Section 89 and the new pension-plan rules represent Congress' deepest penetration yet into the employer-provided benefits system. Experts say the two provisions encompass more changes and affect more plans than even the sweeping 1974 Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA). That law placing intricate controls on employer-provided pension plans marked Congress' first concentrated attempt to regulate private-sector employee benefits. Since then, the lawmakers have amended and expanded employee-benefits laws almost annually, often to the confusion and dismay of employers.

In enacting Section 89, Congress said its goal was the extension of benefits, especially health insurance, to millions of lower-income workers who are inadequately covered or not covered at all. Under the law, part-time employees who work as few as 17.5 hours a week must be included in calculations to determine whether plans are discriminatory.

The congressional Joint Committee on Taxation explained its intent this way: "The [Section 89] non-discrimination rules should require employers to cover non-highly compensated employees to an extent comparable to the coverage of highly compensated employees."

But those who are familiar with Section 89 contend that it will have the opposite effect. "It will tend to decrease flexibility and increase administrative costs," says Frederick J. Krebs, manager of business and government policy for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "The effect will be fewer benefits and fewer businesses offering benefits."

"When you look at the cost of compliance, it's just not worth it," says Garry Jerome, a consultant with Mercer Meidinger Hansen Inc., in Philadelphia.

Many major industrial companies expect to spend more than $1 million on compliance costs. An employer with 500 workers can expect to pay upwards of $25,000 for a consultant. A firm with 200 workers could pay $10,000 or more. Small companies may have trouble finding advice for less than $1,000.

The high price of compliance is driven by the law's complexity. Section 89 is an administrative nightmare because it takes what appears to be a simple health plan—like those offered by many small companies—and multiplies it into several plans for testing purposes. Take a medical plan that offers coverage for single workers, workers with children, and workers with spouses, with each option offering two different deductibles. Under Section 89, that plan becomes six plans, and each must meet the non-discriminations tests. Some major corporations with multiple plans and various benefit packages will have hundreds of plans to test.

Because the chances of failure to comply increase with the number of options available to employees, many employers will feel pressure to cut back on choices now available and steer clear of providing new ones.

The enormous complexity of Section 89 has promoted its critics to speculate that Congress was more interested in raising revenue than expanding benefits. "It's really a revenue statute dressed up to look like a do-gooder statute," says Howard C. Weizmann, executive director for the Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans.

The joint tax committee estimates that Section 89 will net about $300 million a year in revenue derived largely from treating a portion of higher-plaid employees' benefits as taxable income. But Congress may have greatly underestimated the law's impact for two reasons.

First, lawmakers may have been too optimistic about the law's ability to persuade employers to extend benefits to lower-paid employees. Kent A. Mason, the law's chief architect, told a healthcare seminar in December that in most cases, employers will count any discriminatory excess benefits as income to highly paid workers and will "gross up" those employees' salaries—that is, increase their salaries to cover the newly taxable portion of benefits. "This option is much cheaper than extending benefits to low-paid workers," said Mason, who was counsel to the joint tax committee and now works for the Washington law firm of Caplin & Drysdale.

Second, widespread non-compliance would produce huge amounts in unanticipated tax penalties, warns Mary Hevener, a benefits attorney with the Washington law firm of Lee, Toomey & Kent. Employers who fail to comply with the non-discrimination rules will pay a tax penalty, calculated at the highest individual tax rate, on the benefits received by the highly compensated.

In addition, employees will be taxed on any benefits they receive if the employer fails to maintain a so-called qualified plan, which entails compliance with another set of rules similar to those already applied to pension plans.

Ferruggia and other consultants should be delighted about Section 89. Washington insiders regard it as a consultants' full-employment act. But consultants find themselves in the uncomfortable position of serving as shock troops for advancing a law that almost nobody can believe Congress actually passed.

Pat Haines, senior consultant in the Philadelphia office of the Coopers & Lybrand accounting and consulting firm, says the general reaction she gets from business audiences is, "I can't believe this is happening."

"I think if we are going to cause another American Revolution, Section 89 is it," says Thomas Veal, senior tax manager with Touche Ross and Co. in Washington. "If King George and Parliament had come up with anything like Section 89, it wouldn't have taken seven years to win the Revolutionary War."

Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

In fact, Section 89 slipped through the tax-reform process with little notice. "No one focused on benefits changes" in the 1986 tax-reform legislation, said a Senate aide. "They just sort of happened."

Now, many employers are dragging their feet on compliance, waiting for it to collapse under its own weight. "We are hearing from employers who are predicting that Congress will repeal Section 89 sometime in [1989] after the outcry [over its complexity] begins," says Ken Feltman, executive director of the Employee Council on Flexible Compensation. He estimates that 60 percent of all businesses, primarily small companies, have not yet heard about Section 89, making ignorance of the law a major obstacle to compliance.

While large and midsized firms typically are staffed to keep abreast of changes in benefits laws, many small firms don't have the facilities to do so.

Observes Donald Utter, owner of Medical Personnel Pool, in Madison, Wis.: "It's the one secret that the government has been able to keep. Almost every small-business person I mention it to doesn't know what I'm talking about."

But small-business owners shouldn't assume that Congress will come to the rescue. Section 89 has powerful friends on Capitol Hill, including the two key figures behind the 1986 Tax Reform Act—Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, and Sen. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee.

The law reflects a longstanding concern among many lawmakers that the federal government doesn't have enough control over who gets tax-exempt, employer-paid benefits, according to staffers on the tax-writing committees. The joint tax committee estimates that employer-provided health-care plans alone cost the government $32 billion a year in "lost" revenue.

That kind of money, Congress decided, should produce better social-policy results, namely health insurance for lower-paid workers. Section 89 was driven by the perception that many employers were giving their highest-paid employees generous benefits while giving their lower-paid employees less or nothing at all. Supporters of this view note that 52 percent of the 37 million Americans who have no health insurance either work full time or are members of families headed by full-time workers. Accordingly, Congress cracked its tax-policy whip, forcing employers to fall into line or risk losing a tax subsidy for highly paid workers. Said one congressional staff member who worked on the legislation: "Why should the government be satisfied that blue-collar workers are getting less than white-collar workers?"

Business owners generally have no quarrel with Congress' intent. It's the execution that has benefits managers throwing up their hands in frustration.

Most large and midsized companies have turned to outside consultants for assistance. Small firms may find they have no other choice, says Feltman, of the Employee Council on Flexible Compensation. "In the end, what we have is a technician's dream and a layman's nightmare," he adds, explaining that Congress made Section 89 "so complex that the traditional expert that the small-business owner has relied on, his insurance broker, is no longer an expert. Now he'll have to go to higher-priced talent: lawyers, accountants, and consultants."

Reed Creaser, secretary/treasurer for General Crane and Hoist Inc., in Richmond Hill, Ga., already knows what it's like to ask questions and get no answers. "I've asked several insurance companies to send me what they have on Section 89, but nobody has sent me anything yet. The individual agents seem to be as much in the dark as we are," he says.

Whether individual employers discriminate or not, the law puts the burden of proof on them. Collecting and analyzing the data needed on each employee frequently may cost more than correcting any discrimination that is found. In fact, an employer may sink thousands of dollars into data collection and analysis just to show that no discrimination exists.

Among the law's data requirements are those that compel employers to:

Identify the highly compensated and the non-highly compensated.

Determine who may be excluded from the tests.

Identify each benefit that must be tested.

Sort out the family status of employees for separate family coverage testing.

Determine the number of former employees subject to testing.

Determine whether parts of an organization can be tested as a separate line of business.

Once the information is assembled, it isn't enough to show that coverage was offered. Benefit plans will be judged by the percentage of employees who actually participate.

The Section 89 Coalition, a group of 190 associations and businesses, lobbied unsuccessfully last year for a one-year delay in Section 89. The coalition's efforts were motivated in part by the Treasury Department's failure to produce regulations to implement the law. But Congress was in no mood to start chipping away at tax reform, especially when delay would add $300 million to the federal budget deficit.

"The coalition met very heavy resistance from Rostenkowski," said Christine Hartoft, a legislative assistant with the Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans. "He wasn't interested in anything that would make it look like tax reforms was unraveling."

Nonetheless, the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988, signed into law Nov. 11, did contain some of the coalition's recommendations for simplifying the law. Among them:

Employers may test their benefit plans for compliance with non-discrimination rules on one day of the year; they do not have to track each benefit choice by each employee for each day of the year.

Benefit plans will not fail the nondiscrimination tests simply because too many employees choose to be covered by the spouses' plans.

Companies with nine or fewer workers may phase in coverage for part-time employees, those who work at least 17.5 hours a week, over three years.

The latter two changes are major concessions to the concerns of small companies, says Ron Danilson, assistant director of group operations with the Principal Financial Group of Des Moines, Iowa. A 1988 company survey of 100 employers with fewer than 10 workers found that up to 70 percent would fail, primarily because of the initial participation requirements for parttimers and workers covered by a spouse's insurance plan.

But even with the changes, the law and the monumental problems it poses for employers remain basically intact. "To expect small business to understand Section 89 is absolutely ludicrous," says Danilson. Others who have studied the revisions still don't like what they see.

"It seems to me that if a company is considering putting in a health-care plan, and they run into this, they will just forget it," says Frank L. Mason, president of the Mason Corp., a Birmingham, Ala., manufacturer of metal building products.

"It's just too much of a burden to keep up with all the detail and still run a business," he adds. "You can just load a small-business wagon so full, and when you get beyond that, something has to give."

WE NEED MANDATORY INSPECTION OF FISH AND FISH PRODUCTS

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today legislation that would greatly improve the safety of the American consumer of fish and seafood products.

There is growing evidence that we need mandatory Federal inspection of fish and fish products, and growing support for such inspection.

Every year, the importance of fish in the American diet increases. Until the middle of this century, the consumption of fish products was essentially limited to coastal areas of the United States. Today, many species of fish are consumed nationwide. Since 1975, per capita consumption has increased substantially, and over the next several years, consumption is expected to grow by nearly 3 percent annually.

Currently, only 20 percent of the fish consumed in this country has undergone voluntary Federal inspection. There is currently no mandatory inspection of seafood products as there is for meat and poultry. Instead, fish inspection is a hit-or-miss program, paid for by processors themselves. While the Food and Drug Administration has some oversight responsibility, their role is limited to spot checks and recall of hazardous products only after they are on the supermarket shelf.

The most recent report from the Centers for Disease Control indicates 24 percent of traceable food-borne illnesses were linked to fish and shellfish in 1982. This CDC report shows that food poisoning outbreaks are 10 times more likely to be caused by seafood than by beef.

In March 1986, the prestigious New England Journal of Medicine reported that consumption of raw shellfish is known to be associated with individual cases and sporadic outbreaks of enteric illness. In fact, an outbreak of gastroenteritis which reached epidemic proportions in New York State in 1982 was linked to raw shellfish.

An increasing number of fish and shellfish processors favor strengthening inspection of their products. As the National Fisheries Institute said at a congressional hearing in 1986, "It is logical that seafood inspection be reevaluated and restructured to encourage greater consumer acceptance of seafood for the sake of ensuring health benefits and to allow the Nation to benefit from the significant potential offered by our fishery resources."

My bill, the Mandatory Fish Inspection Act of 1989, would require the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a comprehensive, statistically sound program of mandatory inspection of the commercial processing of all freshwater and saltwater fish, shellfish, and their products which are used for human consumption.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in protecting American consumers by cosponsoring this important legislation.

WILL WE GET OUR HOUSE IN ORDER?

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, Jonathan Marshall of the Oakland Tribune's editorial staff is perhaps the most knowledgeable editorial writer on the flawed approach of our Federal Government's so-called war on drugs. Time and time again, the Tribune has printed lengthy discussions written by Jonathan about our Nation's drug policies. The paper continually raises some provocative questions about how we can best succeed in this area.

I'm sure a majority of Members of this body would agree with President Bush's statement that "we will never win this war on drugs unless we stop demand for drugs." That point is clear cut and obvious. I'm not as sure, however, about the efficacy of the arguments of some who think we ought to invade Colombia, pave Bolivia, or bulldoze the Andeas in order to stop the supply.

A National Institutue on Drug Abuse analysis of national drug consumption found that just 10 percent of cocaine consumers consume 51 percent of all the cocaine used in our country. The demand for the drug is driving the supply.

Yet we only have 250,000 public and private treatment slots to help the estimated 2 million of the 6.5 million cocaine and heroin addicts who will seek treatment this year.

Yes, we ought to do everything in our power to encourage other countries from growing, and exporting to our country, illicit narcotics. However, we should also first get our own house in order.

Clearly, we can't win the war on drugs without cutting the demand for drugs. I believe that affordable, available treatment and drug education awareness are the best answers to cutting the demand.

The following editorial makes some very valuable points:

EXPORTING THE DRUG PROBLEM

"This scourge will stop," President Bush declared in his inaugural address. But his own State Department told a different story last week in its latest annual report on the worldwide drug problem.

Everywhere, drug supplies are on the rise. Opiuim production jumped in Afghanistan and Burma. Cocaine boomed in Bolivia. Marijuana surged in Colombia. The world is awash in drugs as never before.

Despite every indication that supply-side drug enforcement has failed, politicians, fervently demand beef-up eradication and interdiction efforts. Both conservative drug czar William Bennett and liberal Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., propose sending U.S. troops to Latin America to wage war against peasants and shadowy traffickers. Like Gen. William, Westmoreland in Vietnam, they claim to see light at the end of the tunnel—if only Americans will invest more money and more manpower in the drug war.

On one point they do have a case: The United States has never made fighting the drug traffic its absolute, number one priority. As the State Department report admits, "political and economic instability in drug-producing areas around the world have resulted in the subordination of our drug control agenda to other pressing concerns."

True enough. It's no accident that the countries singled out by the Bush administration for sanctions because of their role in the drug trade—Panama, Afghanistan, Iran, Syria, Laos and Burma—are simply those it dislikes for other reasons. Countries no less guilty of fostering the drug trade—Mexico, Colombia, Bolivia, Peru, Paraguay, the Bahamas, Pakistan—win reprieve year after year because of their friendship or importance to the United States.

"The hypocrisy doesn't stop there, however. As the implicated nations quickly point out, Washington demands that they cut supply, even though it hasn't managed to cut U.S. demand, which drives the worldwide market. Congress insists that foreign nations vanquish sophisticated drug armies when it can't even keep Jamaican gangs from taking over the streets of Washington, DC. The administration expects Peru to spray its jungles with deadly herbicides like Spike when the United States won't even use Paraquat on its own marijuana fields. And Americans point the finger at foreign producers of cocaine and heroin when domestic marijuana plantations and PCP and amphetamine labs turn out vast quantities of drugs for the domestic market.

America pays a high price for such hypocrisy. The obvious double standard makes enemies of people throughout the world who feel judged and condemned by an arrogant superpower that won't even get its own house in order. And it blinds Americans to tackling domestic sources of the problem by making easy scapegoats of foreign devils.

Worst of all, it encourages demagogues to rail for an extension of failed drug strategies abroad, regardless of the cost.

The cost is high. The combination of the private U.S. demand for drugs and the official U.S. demand for foreign drug enforcement promotes the growth of organized crime, corruption and violence throughout much of the Third World. Countries like Colombia have lost control of their own fate to U.S.-financed traffickers who murder police chiefs, prosecutors, judges, publishers and politicians with impunity.

The heedless extension of U.S. drug eradication programs in turn pushes desperate peasants into the hands of guerrilla organizations like the fanatic Shining Path in Peru or Marxist FARC in Colombia. These groups represent a challenge to peace and democracy every bit as great as that posed by the traffickers.

In the long run, the United States cannot export its responsibility for solving the drug problem. Americans can only export the problem itself by making the rest of the world pay for our own failure to cope with the social and personal reasons why individuals misuse drugs in the first place.

THE 1989 SCHOLAR ATHLETES—THE NATIONAL FOOTBALL FOUNDATION AND HALL OF FAME

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to 19 young men who have been selected as the 1989 Scholar Athletes by the Sacramento Valley Chapter of the National Football Foundation and Hall of Fame.

The young men being honored are to be commended for their outstanding performances both on and off the football field. These students have demonstrated superior academic application and athletic ability, sportsmanship, school leadership and citizenship. I ask that my colleagues join me in saluting Mark Krieger of the University of California, Davis; Rick Pembrook of the University of Pacific; Ken Stinnett of California State University, Sacramento; Robert Blair and Bryon Rockwell of Davis High School; David DeMarco of Woodland High School; Greg Harcos, Greg Quilici and Chris Campbell of Jesuit High School; Kris Johnson of Bear River High School; Mike McCarn of Lincoln High School; Mark Parsons and Robert Perry of Bella Vista High School; Laurence Taylor and Allen Woods of Rio Americano High School; Mark Eddy of Delta High School; Jason Hartsfield of San Juan High School; Khari Jones of Center High School; and Woon Park of Fairfield High School; for their superlative achievements.

I would like to pay special tribute to two young men who have demonstrated courage and outstanding scholar-athlete performances in the face of adversity. Michael Morris Gipson and Ernest Rodriguez are to be commended for their dedication and spirit in playing football with only one leg.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate these young men for their distinguished accomplishments. I know that the determination and drive which they have demonstrated will serve them well in their future endeavors and I wish them continued success.

PEACEFUL RESOLUTION TO THE PROBLEMS IN TIBET

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the reason all of us are here today supporting passage of this resolution is simple. It is to let the Government of the People's Republic of China know, very clearly, that the next few years can hold either great promise or great regret in their relationship with our Nation.

With the election of President George Bush, the Government of the People's Republic of China knows that it has an old acquaintance with whom it can talk concerning any diplomatic disagreements we may have. But its leaders must also know, if they do not already understand it, that this American President holds a strong commitment to human rights. They must clearly understand that both his views on their policies and the views of this Congress will be heavily influenced by the actions that they take with regard to the rights of the peoples they govern. This influence will be magnified to the extent that they either respect or disregard previous promises they have made under the slogan of "two systems, one country."

Today is the 30th anniversary of the Chinese suppression of the national uprising in Tibet. We all had hoped that those days of martial law and bloodshed had been foresaken by the People's Republic of China. Events now taking place in Tibet, however, point out to us all that they have not. Tibetans are being killed, dragged from their homes, and arrested. Foreign tourists are being prevented from traveling to Tibet and possibly reporting on Chinese police actions there.

If our two nations' relations are to further improve at any level, they must do so on the basis that the Government of the People's Republic of China understands and sincerely respects human rights and the rightful place of democratic institutions in society. While there are signs that that government is aware of the importance we here in the United States place on such respect for human rights, its actions to date to build such respect have not been sufficient.

On the one hand, the People's Republic of China has indicated that it is more actively investigating abuses of human rights by its agencies and police, but on the other, it continues to avoid the talks that the Dalai Lama has offered to hold with its representatives to review and improve the true state of human and political rights in Tibet.

It will simply not be enough for the People's Republic of China to issue stern warnings against dissent and then repress political protests whenever it wishes. Not if it truly wishes to gain the trust of the United States and the rest of the free world.

As economic freedom grows in the People's Republic of China, political freedom will continue to seek its own birth. Such democratic and cultural freedoms will be sought by all of China's peoples, and each time any such striving is met by the kind of repression we are seeing today in Tibet, our two nations' relations will suffer, and suffer greatly.

The Foreign Minister of the People's Republic of China, Mr. Qichen, recently stated that he thought our two nations' relations were very likely to flourish with the election of Mr. Bush to the Presidency. I urge Mr. Qichen and the other leaders of his government to truly give such great expectations a chance to take concrete form. I join my colleagues here today in urging the People's Republic of China to accept the Dalai Lama's offer for a peaceful resolution of the problems that are once again painfully obvious in Tibet.

THE 70TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join in recognizing the 70th anniversary of the American Legion.

Founded at a caucus of the American Expeditionary Force, March 15–17, 1919, in Paris, France, the American Legion was chartered by Congress on September 16, 1919.

For 70 years the American Legion has worked to further the interest of veterans and their families, to promote national security, to improve educational and recreational services and to support the expression of Armeican ideals.

The American Legion was instrumental in organizing the U.S. Veterans Bureau. In 1930 this became the Veterans' Administration. It is fitting that this 70th anniversary year is marked by the elevation of the Secretary of the Veterans' Affairs to Cabinet rank.

The American Legion was a leader for the GI bill of rights which has been an essential part of the opportunity provided to our veterans.

The American Legion has also campaigned for increased display of the American flag and for its proper display. Recent events have demonstrated their effectiveness at raising this issue when the American flag has been displayed on the floor for people to walk upon.

The American Legion has been an integral part of American culture and society for 70 years now. The legion has sponsored baseball teams, Boy Scout troops, a national high school oratorical contest, Boys State and Boys Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the American Legion on their 70th anniversary and thank them on behalf of our Nation, for their hard work, dedication and service, in war and peace, to the United States of America.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PROVIDE FOR THE SALE OF THE SLY PARK UNIT OF THE CVP TO THE EL DORADO IRRIGATION DISTRICT

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation to provide for the sale of the Sly Park Unit of California's Central Valley Project to the El Dorado Irrigation District in El Dorado County, CA.

Mr. Speaker, last year the Interior Subcommittee on Water and Power held a hearing that focused on this proposed sale. At that hearing, the El Dorado Irrigation District presented its case for approval of this sale. The CVP Water Users Association has also officially endorsed this sale. It is important to note that no testimony was presented to the subcommittee in opposition to this proposed sale. Mr. Speaker, I strongly believe it is time for Congress to pass this legislation. The reasons to do so are clear.

First, the Sly Park Unit is operationally separate from the rest of the CVP and that the El Dorado Irrigation District is the sole beneficiary of this unit. For this reason it makes eminent sense to separate the Sly Park Unit from the rest of the CVP financially as well.

Second, at a time when the Federal Government is reducing its involvement in water project construction and operation, particularly for smaller, independently operated projects such as Sly Park, it makes sense both from a fiscal and resource management standpoint for the Federal Government to sell this project to the local user and beneficiary.

In the long run both the county of El Dorado and the Federal Government will benefit from this sale. The sale of the Sly Park Unit will allow the Federal Government to recoup its original investment plus the appropriate interest, and to cease to incur any more operating and maintenance costs—in that sense, Mr. Speaker, by raising Federal revenues this proposal is actually a deficit reduction measure.

On the other hand, from the local perspective, this sale would mean that the Sly Park users would own this facility which they've been operating and maintaining for more than 30 years, and they will cease to incur additional interest costs in the future on a project they are willing to pay off now.

This proposal is consistent with the new generation of water policy endorsed by the Congress with passage of H.R. 6 in the 99th Congress: It places the burden of owning and operating a water project on the local beneficiary—not the Federal Government.

The provisions in the bill allow for the Secretary of the Interior to set the price based on the actual construction costs plus interest on the M&I portions of the project plus Federal O&M costs minus what EDID has already paid under their existing water contracts.

It is our intention in writing the price this way to determine the fair and equitable level which will help the Federal Government recover its investment and allow El Dorado, in essence, to buy out its existing contract.

A LETTER FROM EL SALVADOR

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the following letter from Mr. Peter O'Driscoll. Mr. O'Driscoll, a former constituent of mine, is now living in San Antonio Los Ranchos, El Salvador, which is the sister city of Berkeley in El Salvador.

In discussing the capture, torture, and release of Mayor Amadeo Lopez and three others, Peter conveys the reality of life in this and other repopulated communities in El Salvador.

APARTADO 01-34, SAN SALVADOR,
EL SALVADOR, CENTRAL AMERICA,
December 20, 1988.

DEAR FRIENDS. Belated Christmas greetings! I hope all is well with you and your families, and as always I shall be thinking of you at this time. As I learned last year, Christmas is a very different proposition down here. In San Salvador, merchants string up fairy lights and display incongruous snow scenes to attract shoppers, much as they do in the States. But it is such a tiny proportion of the population that can afford to indulge that type of Christmas spirit that the sales pitches here quickly strike one as even more obscene than their extravagant counterparts abroad. As we did last year in Calle Real, we will celebrate Christmas in San Antonio Los Ranchos; there will be a mass, then dancing and some special treat, perhaps chicken tamales or a similar local delicacy. But there will be no trees, no lights, no exchange of beautifully wrapped gifts. This not to make "Perry Como's Christmas with the Poor" sound idyllic and simple; times have been tough in our area lately, and even if the army and the FMLN arrange their traditional holiday ceasefire, all indications suggest that they will get even tougher in the New Year. But Salvadoran campesinos do seem to have a gift for putting together lively "fiestas" in the midst of any circumstance, and it is to just such an affair that I look forward to going back—if I can get there.

Several recent events have conspired to destabilize the position of foreign volunteers in Chalatenango, while threatening in much more serious ways the equanimity of the civilian population there. In my last letter I described the bus journey from San Salvador to Los Ranchos, noting the "game" that is played at the Colima roadblock as one tries to enter the department of Chalatenango. Well, last November 27th I lost! No amount of pleading or patient explanation of the need for Church presence in rural communities would convince the bored but cocky sergeant to let me through. I was forced, fuming, to trek back to the capital. Playing by the same non-rules, I passed through two days later with no problems, in the company of Fr. Dick Howard, S.J., who is regional director of the Jesuit Refugee Service in Central America. However, as we arrived in Guarjila, just down the road from Los Ranchos, we noticed that the village had been militarized, and that there were government troops all over the place. A quick consultation with village leaders confirmed that the soldiers were searching houses, and that it was feared that they might steal food and medicine from the warehouse, as has been done before, on the basis of allegations that the villagers use them to supply guerilla groups. As a result, people asked that the mass we were going to celebrate in Los Ranchos be moved to Guarjila so as not to leave the village unattended. I then drove to Los Ranchos, inviting the people there to the mass in Guarjila, and within less than an hour several hundred from both communities had gathered and were waiting for mass to begin. The atmosphere was a little tense, but I remember joking with Dick beforehand as I looked over the day's scripture I was to read, Isaiah 11:1-11; ". . . He will bring justice to the weak, and will proclaim fairness to the poor. His words will bring down the oppressor . . ." Strong stuff indeed, the kind of passage Liberation Theologians drool over and simple Salvadoran campesinos look to for hope and an understanding of their situation. But what would the elite, U.S.-trained "Atlacatl" Battalion think of such subversive talk?

Mass proceeded normally, even as the sound of gunfire on a nearby hillside elicited some worried looks. But as the congregation rose for communion, several intense volleys of machine gunfire from positions only 100 yards from our wall-less, tin-roofed chapel drew some shrieks of panic, as many dropped instinctively to the ground, while others began to scatter in search of cover. This brief disorder was brought under control by a community leader who took the microphone and calmly but firmly told the people to stay where they were. (You must try to understand that these refugees are the survivors of the infamous civilian massacres of the early 1980's, people who cannot forget that it was these same government troops who swept through their homelands, killing and burning, so as to depopulate the region and thus prevent collaboration between civilians and guerrillas. In 1988, I could not imagine that they were firing at us, at mass, in broad daylight. But I have heard enough first-hand stories to know why Salvadorans react that way to gunfire.) "Stay calm, and stay where you are," we were told. "If we are going to die, then we'll all die together." Their unity, born of shared suffering, is the most striking attribute of the people I live with.

The soldiers would later claim that they were firing into the hills, though the villagers, who are of necessity keen observers of the military situation, swear that government troops had already taken the high ground, and that there were no guerrillas in the area. They contend that much of the army's shooting in our area is "psychological warfare," simply for the purpose of intimidating the population. Be that as it may, the intense firing died down within five minutes. Communion was resumed, and we went on to finish the mass. At that point, community leaders convened a meeting and asked their scared but angry constituents if they would be willing to confront the soldiers and ask them to leave the area. Again their unity shone through as the people gathered and walked, amid continued but sporadic gunfire, right up to the biggest group of soldiers, who were crouched in defensive postures behind a low stone wall. Some of these troops were stunned by the sight of several hundred unarmed campesinos demanding to speak to their commanding officer. When this man finally appeared, he was told that the community sought peace and tranquility so as to be able to farm and raise their families, and that military incursions by either side were a contravention of those basic human rights. The officer tried to talk them down, but as the crowd began to chant in unison, calling to some of the soldiers that as sons of campesinos they should lay down their weapons and come work the land, he mumbled something about how they should all go back to their houses, since his unit was leaving anyway in half an hour. Dick and I maintained a respectful distance throughout this exchange, since it is a familiar accusation that foreigners are manipulating and inciting campesinos to insurrection. However, as we all strolled back across a field to the chapel, several shots fired from close range kicked up dirt within 20 yards of us.

The following Friday, December 2, also the eighth anniversary of the murder of four American churchwomen by the National Guard, the president of Los Ranchos was captured by soldiers of the Salvadoran Fourth Infantry Brigade. Amadeo Lopez, 25 years old, was traveling with three other campesinos and United Nations officials in a vehicle belonging to the United Nations High Commission on Refugees, one of the major sponsoring agencies in the repatriation of Salvadorans from Honduras. Despite the protests of the U.N.H.C.R. representative, the four were taken from the car and accused of being guerrillas. (The names of two of the four were already known to the army because they had been visibly involved in negotiations when the refugees came back across the Honduran border.) Before I go on to describe their treatment at the hands of government security forces, I would like to clarify a point. El Salvador is mired in a civil war in which a significant insurgent force is trying to unseat an apparently democratically elected government. This government thus takes steps to maintain its position, as provided for in the 1983 constitution. The law stipulates that a person may be detained for 72 hours of interrogation, with full respect accorded to his physical and mental integrity. At the end of that period he must either be charged and handed over to civil authorities, or released. A full account of what actually happened to these four would fill many pages (though I could provide it to those who are concerned), so I will focus briefly on Amadeo, since his case is most relevant to Los Ranchos.

From the Colima bridge where the four were captured, they were taken to the Fourth Brigade headquarters at El Paraiso, Chalatenango, separated, and immediately interrogated. Amadeo was stripped to his underwear and severely beaten about the chest and abdomen (fewer visible bruises), at times by one interrogator, at times by several soldiers. Hands tied behind his back, he was hung by a rope passed under his arms and again repeatedly beaten. He was dragged to a sink full of water, where soldiers submerged his face until he passed out. This type of treatment continued for at least 12 hours throughout the six full days that he was held. Most of that time he went without food or water, for even when a soldier tossed him a can of beans, as he lay dazed and naked on his cell floor, he did not have anything with which to open it. One of the four prisoners alleges that during his beating, two men entered the room speaking English, watched for a while, and then left. Since the prisoner was blindfolded, it would be difficult to identify these two, though the most obvious English-speaking residents of that garrison are the American military advisors.

Because I live with him, I know that Amadeo Lopez is not a guerrilla. After 144 hours of beatings, torture, death threats and interrogation, the Salvadoran military could find no scrap of evidence upon which to base a civil case. After two consecutive 72 hour periods they were forced to release him, at which point he was rushed to a doctor for x-rays and medical treatment. Somehow this man found the courage to return to Los Ranchos within a week of his release, to resume his responsibilities as village leader. It seems clear that Amadeo's real crime, in the eyes of the powers that be, was his Herculean effort to organize the 1,000 people in his community to leave Honduras and return to their homeland. It was the government forces that drove them out in the first place, and that now seem to want to intimidate them into leaving again. What do you make of this case? What should Amadeo do under the circumstances, now that he has been threatened with death if he continues his work as community organizer? What can be done to correct such blatant abuses of his human and constitutional rights?

The people of Los Ranchos and surrounding communities have only one answer to those questions. They feel that they must organize to defend themselves and to publicize their plight. On Monday December 5, 72 hours after Amadeo's capture, several hundred villagers marched two hours to the city of Chalatenango to demand his release. When they reached the roadblock on the outskirts of town, soldiers fired shots over their heads to alert the barracks, and immediately reinforcements came down to close the road and force the villagers to return without even having the grounds for Amadeo's detention explained to them. As the days dragged on and no progress was made towards his release, villagers grew all the more indignant, and resolved to return that Friday, December 9, determined not to be turned back until they reached the barracks where he was being held. Shots were fired over their heads again as they entered Chalatenango, but they pressed on. More soldiers arrived, again firing into the air, but the protesters continued into the city's crowded marketplace, chanting in unison their demand for Amadeo's release. At this point more than 60 soldiers arrived with rope, sealed off the road again, and began to advance on the crowd. A pushing match developed, as villagers shouted that they had a right to know what was going on, while the soldiers tried to force them back. Tempers flared, and the soldiers began to beat protesters with their rifle butts. Frightened merchants picked up their wares and stalls and fled for cover. Finally the soliders opened fire, first into the air over the marcher's heads, and then into the cobbled streets at their feet. The shooting continued as the crowd ran in disarray, many of the women losing their plastic sandals in the panic and confusion. The soldiers chased them halfway to Guarjila, some of the villagers running despite bruises of wounds they had suffered. When the smoke cleared, one man had a bullet wound in the buttock, eight had shrapel wounds caused by fragmented bullets and stones from the shots fired into the ground, and more than fifty were bruised or beaten by rifle blows. Because of Amadeo's capture, these protest marches, and heightened military activity in our area, tension is running quite high. People are scared that reprisal measures will be taken against them, but they are more determined than ever to stand their ground in defense of their right to peacefully build their community.

What is going to happen in El Salvador in 1989? Talk on both sides is of intense fighting, further increases in death squad activity and political violence, and more profound polarization of the extremes of left and right. Where should one stand in such a divided country? Let me try to give you a sense of how poignant, tragic, and seemingly irreparable that division is. Two weeks ago I walked seven hours with over a hundred people from Los Ranchos to the mountain village of Arcatao. Most current residents of Los Ranchos actually lived around Arcatao before the war, but its inaccessibility made it an impractical site for their large-scale repatriation from Honduras. We walked on twisting, overgrown paths littered with shell casings, through destroyed and deserted hamlets, and the closer we got to Arcatao, the more vivid became the reminiscences of the villagers, who were after all returning to visit their original homes for the first time in eight years. "Ah, Pedro, so-and-so lived here, but he was killed by the National Guard . . . So-and-so was raped and beheaded down by that stream . . . This is where they murdered so-and-so and left her two-week-old baby still sucking at her breast until we found them the next day . . ." We crossed the Sumpul River about a mile downstream from where 600 campesinos were massacred by the army in 1980 as they fled toward Honduras. I walked with and listened to some of those who had seen it all and survived. How can they be expected to trust or forgive their government after Sumpul, to forget the lost family members and believe that things have changed?

Yet a short walk in San Salvador, even in the poorest neighborhoods, reveals much more the exhaustion, the dispiritedness and the hopelessness of this interminable war than the dogged resolve and clear memories of many rural communities. So many people are just so sick of the poverty, all of which is now conveniently blamed on the "delinquent Communist terrorists," that they seem ready to accept any settlement as long as they're left alone, even with what little they have. Into this atmosphere of quiet despair, the soothing, insidious and ubiquitous propaganda of the presidential electoral campaign seeps, with all its grandiose promises and vague solutions. Those who remember the worst repression of the early 1980's, and who are reminded of it now as things get worse, will never accept the elections as anything more than band-aids on the open sore of corruption and exploitation. But the fatigue level is so high that the "peace at any price" ticket looks pretty good to so many others. Opinion polls reveal that even among those who are going to vote, there is very little faith either in the promises of the candidates or the impartiality of the system.

So where does one stand? Martin Luther King said that one must accept finite disappointment without losing infinite hope. I must admit that hope seems to be in short supply these days. But another great inspiration to me in the midst of all this is the legacy of Oscar Romero, the Archbishop who was martyred in 1980 by the death squads. It is with his Christmas message, from December 25, 1977 that I will leave you. In continued thanks for your help and support, I wish you all the best for the holiday season, and a wonderful 1989.

Peace, Thanks, and God's Blessing,

PETER.

URBAN SLUMS GROWING

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, in the Delaware Valley nearly 20 years ago there were 29,445 of our neighbors living in what sociologists call impacted ghettos.

"Impacted ghettos," as the editorial reproduced below from the March 12 Philadelphia Inquirer points out, are urban slums so wretched that most Americans wouldn't drive through them in an armored truck, let alone live in them.

Less than a decade later in 1980 the number of people living in such neighborhoods in our region had grown six times to 194,730. The trend continued in the 1980's, as nationwide the number of Americans living in urban poverty nearly doubled from 1980 to 1985.

These brutal neighborhoods, so savage and cruel, breed a growing American underclass.

The problem worsens, more and more children of our cities are leading desperate and violent lives while the Government—and indeed society—turns its face away.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Mar. 12, 1989]

ISOLATING THE POOR

THE GHETTOS TODAY ARE WORSE THAN EVER—AND THE CHANCES OF ESCAPE ARE DIMINISHING

You don't need a doctorate in sociology to figure out that America's continuing prosperity has bypassed its urban ghettos—and that the ghetto poor have indeed grown poorer. One drive through North Philadelphia tells you a lot of what you need to know. But a new study from the National League of Cities provides useful statistical documentation of this alarming trend—and shows that nowhere is the problem more pronounced than here in the Philadelphia region.

Consider this: In 1970 there were 29,445 people in the region living in "impacted ghettos"—the poorest of the poor neighborhoods. These are census tracts where male unemployment, welfare recipients, female-headed households and high-school dropouts are at least double the norm for the metropolitan area. By 1980 that number had grown to 194,730 people—a rate of increase that outstripped Detroit, Chicago and every other American city.

There can be little doubt that this trend has continued in the 1980s. According to Richard P. Nathan, a Princeton professor who heads the university's Urban and Regional Research Center, the number of American families living in inner city poverty areas nearly doubled between 1980 and 1985—from 884,000 to 1.7 million households.

This business of documenting the "isolation" of poor people—nearly all of them black and Hispanic—into neighborhoods where poverty is rampant is no mere academic exercise. The more densely the poor are grouped, the more likely it is that they will remain poor. This, too, is hardly surprising. Places where failure and hopelessness abound are not good breeding grounds for success.

But why are Philadelphia and Camden outstripping other old industrial cities in the growth of their urban underclass? The League of Cities study has an interesting hypothesis. It compared 15 large, old metropolitan areas and found a striking correlation between the isolation of the poor in ghettos and the decentralization of jobs. The Philadelphia region was on top of both categories. In other words, as jobs—and particularly low-skilled jobs—have moved deeper into the suburbs, the plight of the inner-city poor has worsened.

There are numerous ways to combat this problem, some favored by conservatives, some by liberals. All have merit. The conservatives, led by Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jack F. Kemp, want to create "enterprise zones" in inner-city areas—places where businesses would be allowed to operate in an environment free of many encumbering taxes and regulations. They also favor giving the poor housing "vouchers" that allow them to rent homes outside the ghetto with the federal government subsidizing the rent.

The enterprise zones are untried at this point and the voucher system—there are now 150,000 in use nationwide—is not working out as planned. Whether through their own insecurities or active discouragement by landlords, welfare mothers have a hard time finding housing in better neighborhoods. That's why the liberals' more traditional remedies—education, job training and housing assistance within the ghettos—cannot be abandoned. Add to that list a greater need for mass transit that can conveniently carry inner-city residents to relatively low-paying jobs in the suburbs.

Whichever strategies one favors, the goal is the same—"to reconnect the ghetto to opportunity," as the National League of Cities report puts it. There is no bigger challenge facing this region today.

IN CELEBRATION OF GREAT LAKES WEEK

HON. ROBERT W. DAVIS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, this week marks the fourth annual recognition of the Great Lakes, the world's largest body of fresh water.

Last year we witnessed a spate of laws in support of the Great Lakes: A Great Lakes loan program to prevent and mitigate damages caused by high water levels; updated maps of the Great Lakes shore; tracking provisions and increased restrictions on the deposition of medical waste in Great Lakes waters; and a preliminary look at Great Lakes coastal barriers. This legislation underscores the importance of the Great Lakes to the Midwest region and the Nation.

This year, the lakes are faced with challenges we have yet to meet, as well as new obligations. The 1987 Great Lakes Water Quality agreement will require greater commitment by the United States to tackle the problem of toxics reaching our lakes from the air, land, water, and from lake bottoms. Great Lakes residents are at greater risk from toxic pollution than many of their fellow U.S. citizens. To protect them, their children, and other living creatures we must clean up the lakes and keep them clean. Our prospects for accomplishing this herculean task are much improved—it was no coincidence that President Bush first proclaimed his status as an environmentalist on the beaches of Lake Erie.

In addition, the State of Ohio may soon be joining the Federal Coastal Zone Management Program—the 30th State to do so—leaving only a few shoreline miles of Great Lakes coast without federally approved comprehensive management plans. It is possible that the addition of Ohio will assist the three remaining Great Lakes States—Minnesota, Indiana, and Illinois—to taking the first steps in closing the circuit in managing the Nation's fourth coast.

The Great Lakes have much to offer the American people—unsurpassed recreational boating and fishing, a fledgling commercial fishery, export opportunities through its ports, wildlife habitat, and endless research capabilities. Therefore, I urge the Great Lakes delegation of both Houses to continue their excellent working relationship and to spread the word that the Great Lakes are great—for everyone.

BUD SHUSTER REPORTS ON CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, recently some of my colleagues on the House Intelligence Committee—BUD SHUSTER, BOB LIVINGSTON, BOB MCEWEN and DAN GLICKMAN—Traveled to El Salvador, Panama, Honduras, and Nicaragua. Upon returning to Washington, BUD SHUSTER wrote an article highlighting his impressions of the factfinding mission.

Central America remains a dominating U.S. foreign policy concern. I, therefore, urge all my colleagues to take the time to read Mr. SHUSTER'S cogent analysis of what's happening in this troubled and geostrategically important area in America's backyard.

CRISIS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(By Hon. Bud Shuster)

In Panama, General Antonio Noriega gives the back of his hand to America, while the Panamanian economy plummets nearly 50 percent. U.S. sanctions spawn Noriega threats against Canal workers, possibly endangering the operational reliability of that strategic waterway, and Cuban, Libyan and Nicaraguan support pours in to prop up the embattled dictator.

In Nicaragua, the Sandinista Communists seductively manipulate world opinion with promises of a cease-fire and democratic freedoms, while their army continues annihilating the Contra Freedom Fighters. The secret police throw leaders of the Democratic Opposition into jail, as Managua remains the nerve center for supporting Marxist terrorism throughout Central America, and the Government blatantly breaks its promise to honor the Esquipulas II and Sapoa Accords.

In El Salvador, a civil war rages between the democratically elected government and the FMLN Communist guerrillas, supported by the Soviet Union through Cuba and Nicaragua. Meanwhile, El Salvador's fragile democracy and beleaguered economy await national elections and the death of cancer-stricken President Duarte.

In Honduras, the U.N.-supported refugee camps bordering El Salvador serve as safe havens from which the FMLN Communists attack El Salvador, while that tiny democracy struggles to meet its international debt payments, reform its state-controlled economy, and remain vigilant against Cuban and Nicaraguan subversion.

What is the U.S.A. to do?

Strategically, Central America clearly is vital to U.S. long term security. A communized land bridge to North America not only will bring totalitarian rule, economic chaos, and Soviet military domination to our southern flank, but also will trigger a flood of millions of refugees into America.

Neither security nor freedom is possible in Central America without the establishment of healthy democracies. There can be no healthy democracies without the elimination of Communist subversion. Nor can progress be made against the drug war. America must support democracies in Central America and oppose dictatorships of the Left or Right. That means removing Noriega in Panama and defeating Communism in Nicaragua, along with its guerrilla movements in the other Central America countries.

But how?

President Bush must make Central America a high priority, develop a truly comprehensive plan to deal with the region's problems, and work to build a consensus with Congress. The course of history in our hemisphere depends upon Congress's decision to support or obstruct the Bush foreign policy.

The only place in Central America where the U.S. need consider using American troops is Panama. If economic sanctions and diplomacy cannot bring about Noriega's ouster and the restoration of democracy, our vital interests in the Canal—indeed, the world's vital interests—require that we act. Even the Left in America understands that Noriega has got to go.

In Nicaragua, we must support the Contra Freedom Fighters who were winning battles and thereby forcing the Sandinistas into real negotiations and restraining the spread of revolution throughout Central America, until the Liberals in Congress denied them our support. And we must persuade the region's democratic leaders to say publicly what they tell us privately about the Communist threat to their countries.

In El Salvador, we must continue supporting their war against the FMLN Communist guerrillas, while encouraging free elections and respect for human rights. The world has little noted that the death squads of the Far Right have been drastically curtailed, but the Communist guerrillas continue to kill ten to twenty civilians every month. In 1988, they murdered eight village mayors, but the left in America doesn't seem to care.

This Congressman interrogated an FMLN terrorist who had just been captured attempting to plant a bomb in a hotel. He had two more bombs in his possession and a Russian pistol in this belt. Yet, Nicaragua's Foreign Minister D'Escoto, a suspended Catholic priest, stared us straight in the eye and denied that his government supports the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador even though his own President, Daniel Ortega, has admitted doing so. Moreover, D'Escoto: denied that his police incited a riot at a peaceful demonstration by the Democratic Opposition in Nandaime as an excuse to jail their leaders, even though movies of the incident exist; denied that the Nicaraguan economy is based on a Marxist model, even though Ortega has proudly proclaimed Nicaragua a Marxist-Leninist state; and denied that America helped rid Nicaragua of Somoza, even though the Carter Administration withdrew all U.S. aid from the Somoza government and pressured him into leaving the country.

Despite the lies and distortions of the Sandinistas and FMLN Communists, their propaganda is still swallowed by the Left around the world; and sadly, in America, too. Lenin's guidance in Feliks Dzerzhinsky, the father of Soviet Intelligence, still rings true today: "The West are wishful thinkers, so we will give them what they want to think."

Until we face reality, until we see the world as it is, rather than as we wished it were, we will not be able to protect America's future and promote real freedom for our friends.

TRIBUTE TO BETTY JO WATTS

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article from the March 2, 1989 Atlanta Journal-Constitution which highlights the determination and resourcefulness of my constituent, Ms. Betty Jo Watts. Ms. Watts is not only coming back from a devastating accident, but she is providing opportunities and hope for other disabled people. In the process, she is even helping to ensure more cost-effective government spending. Mr. Speaker, Ms. Watts has demonstrated that perseverance can overcome tragedy and physical limitations.

DISABLED WOMAN'S JOB SEES HER THROUGH LOSS

SHE SEEKS TO HIRE OTHERS WHO ARE HANDICAPPED

(By Connie Cunningham)

Betty Jo Watts, president of Pacific Atlantic Products, has what many people might consider to be a traditionally male job—making heavy-duty cable for military weaponry.

Not only does she handle the job with ease, she performs her duties from a wheelchair.

But the wheelchair is only part of the story.

In 1972, 13 years before a fall from a deer stand while on a hunting trip left Ms. Watts paralyzed from the waist down, her husband suffered a brain-damaging stroke. Faced with mounting insurance bills and supporting her family, Ms. Watts took over her husband's business. She attended night school and learned how to solder and read blueprints.

In 1980, Ms. Watts moved to Austell from Burbank, Calif., and relocated the business in 1982 to West Fork Business Park in Lithia Springs. Before moving, she had given custody of her husband, who died in 1982, to her mother-in-law.

Business was good until she suffered the fall in 1985. Ms. Watt's son, daughter and friends filled the work orders to keep the business going while she began therapy at Shepherd Spinal Center.

From her bedside she would teach her son to read blueprints, and eventually she returned to work.

Ms. Watts discovered that working helped her forget the pain some paraplegics experience.

"This is a lot of my therapy instead of drugs," Ms. Watts said.

Ms. Watts wants other disabled people to join her on the job to help them help themselves by earning a decent wage and gaining much needed self-esteem.

She is seeking government assistance to make her entire workshop accessible to the disabled and to train them in cable manufacturing.

Making cable involves many individual jobs, such as counting, reeling and inspecting wire; soldering; operating a machine that assembles multiconductors into cable; installing connectors onto the cable and putting protective covering over the cable.

Ms. Watts said these jobs are not difficult to learn, and most can be done while sitting. In the past, she has taught a quadriplegic and two paraplegics various phases of the manufacturing process.

Many times, she said, the financial assistance the government gives to the disabled discourages them from working. They lose their disability payments when they become employed, and often jobs available to the disabled offer meager wages.

"They wind up to a certain extent living day to day, watching TV or something . . . If they were working, they would have something to look forward to," Ms. Watts said.

Lack of adequate transportation also prevents some disabled from seeking a job, she said.

As a member of Total Accessibility for Cobb, an awareness group for the disabled, Ms. Watts has helped convince the Cobb County Commission to equip all its buses in its upcoming transit system with wheelchair lifts.

Despite lack of transportation and decent wages, many disabled are eager to prove they are just as hard-working and dependable as the able-bodied on the job, she said.

By earning a decent wage, the disabled will be paying taxes like other workers. "So it's not like you're really giving them something. They're giving something back," she said.

The government would also benefit another way, Ms. Watts said. Most of her work is done for the Defense Department, and with more employees, she could increase her volume and lower her prices, she said.

Ms. Watts currently employs her son and a few other workers to make heavy-duty and light-duty cable for bombs, missiles, torpedoes, aircraft and computers.

Ms. Watts said she has no qualms about making cable for military purposes. "I figure we need to be prepared as other countries are. Because if we're not prepared, we cannot fight."

Just as important as lowering her price to the military, though, is offering the disabled the opportunity to feel a sense of accomplishment. "You know you're still in the chair, but if you have the self-esteem of going to work, you feel just as good as the next person," Ms. Watts said.

CONYERS INTRODUCES LEGISLATION TO EXTEND AND MAKE PERMANENT THE MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. FEDERAL HOLIDAY COMMISSION

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, today, a bipartisan group of more than 80 of our colleagues has joined with me in reintroducing H.R. 4443, legislation which passed the House in the 100th Congress to extend the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission beyond its current expiration date of April 1989, and make it a permanent Commission.

The Martin Luther King, Jr. Federal Holiday Commission was established in 1984 following enactment of legislation designating a Federal holiday in Dr. King's honor. Its purpose then was to encourage appropriate ceremonies and activities throughout the United States relating to the first observance of the Federal holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr. In addition, the Commission was directed to provide advice and assistance to organizations with respect to the observance of the holiday.

The Commission has encouraged appropriate nationwide ceremonies relating to the observance of the holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr., and sponsored activities which educate the American people about Dr. King's values of racial equality and nonviolent social change. It performs an important service by promoting the teachings of Dr. King and coordinating special commemorative events in the United States and many nations around the world.

The Commission is also instrumental in instructing our young people of the dangers of drugs and the importance of education. Children are encouraged to "Live the Dream" of Dr. King and continued Commission efforts are crucial if the program is to succeed.

The worldwide and civil and human rights community needs the Commission's continued coordinated guidance so that the international celebration of Dr. King's legacy may continue.

Reverend King was a brilliant civil rights leader, a distinguished member of the clergy, and a Nobel laureate. His vision of equal rights and opportunity for all people transformed this country and energized social justice movements around the globe. Unfortunately, the impact and the importance of Dr. King's life is being diluted by commercialism and selective memory.

The continuation of the Martin Luther King Federal Holiday Commission will help prevent further distortion in Dr. King's message and will help spread his true legacy to the uninformed. When the Commission first began its work in the fall of 1984, only 19 States observed Dr. King's birthday. This year, however, all but seven States and over 100 foreign countries have made his birthday an official holiday.

This year, because of the efforts of the Commission, millions of American participated in seminars, rallies, prayer services, and other tributes. People of all races, cultures and political persuasions came together in the same spirit of good will and fellowship that characterized Dr. King's life. The Commission has developed and helped to distribute "Living the Dream" pledge cards on which over 2 million people have affirmed their commitment to the ideals of freedom, justice and opportunity for all. In preparation for the third national holiday celebration, the Commission distributed more than 300,000 pamphlets, posters and maps, responded to 5,000 inquiries, and serviced over 135 State and local holiday commissions. The Commission has also published and distributed the new "Living the Dream" newsletter which provides information to King holiday celebrants around the country.

Consistent with the teachings of Dr. King, the Commission participates in projects addressing issues of national concern such as teen pregnancy, drug and alcohol abuse, illiteracy, urban economic development, child abuse, family violence, job placement and counseling, and voter registration.

The Commission has achieved near miracles with minimal private donations and appropriate fund-raising activities, but in order to fully meet its mandate the Commission's resources needs are much greater than private efforts to day have met.

A small Federal appropriation will enable the Commission to devote its time to carrying out its congressional mandate, rather than exert and exhaust its energies on fund-raising activities.

As Dr. King said when he set the goal in his 1963 March on Washington speech:

When we allow freedom to rein, when we let it ring from every village and hamlet, from every State and city, we will be able to speed up that day when all of God's children—black and white, Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant—will be able to join hands and sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual, Free at least.

We must continue the work of the Commission.

If Martin Luther King, Jr.'s dream is to be a reality, then it must become a reality in the minds of people everywhere. The Commission will make that possible.

On the night before Dr. King was assassinated, he asked a crowd in Memphis to remember him neither for his celebrity nor for his countless awards, degrees and publications. He asked only that he be remembered for leading a committed life. Two decades after Dr. King made the ultimate sacrifice for the betterment of the Nation, we have the chance to offer something in return to this man who gave us all so much.

The challenge remains for us to complete the work that he began. The celebration of his birthday will serve as an annual reminder of the task that lies before us. A permanent Commission will serve the essential role of making sure that Dr. King's life retains its special significance in our lives and memories.

A copy of the bill follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission Extension Act".

SEC. 2. REMOVAL OF TERMINATION.

(a) REMOVAL.—Section 9 of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1475) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. The Commission shall continue in existence until terminated by law.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) FINDINGS.—Paragraph (3) of the first section of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1473) is amended by striking "first".

(2) PURPOSES.—Section 3(1) of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1473) is amended by striking "first occurs on January 20, 1986" and inserting "occurs on the third Monday in January each year".

SEC. 3. MEMBERSHIP.

(a) TERMS IN GENERAL.—Section 4(c) of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1474) is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3), members of the Commission shall be appointed not later than June 1 of each year for terms of 1 year, and any vacancy in the Commission shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment was made. Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers.

"(2) Coretta Scott King shall serve as a member for life. In the event of a vacancy, her position on the Commission shall be filled by a member of the family surviving Martin Luther King, Jr., not already a member of the Commission, who shall be appointed by the family and shall serve as a member of the Commission at the discretion of the family.

"(3) The 2 members of the Commission appointed as members of the family surviving Martin Luther King, Jr., shall serve as members of the Commission at the discretion of the family.".

(b) CONTINUATION OF TERMS OF EXISTING MEMBERS.—The individuals who are members of the Commission on the date of the enactment of this Act shall be considered to have been appointed members for a term ending on the first June 1 that occurs after the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 4. REPORTS.

Section 8 of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1475) is amended by striking the period at the end and inserting the following: "with respect to the most recent observance of the Federal legal holiday honoring the birthday of Martin Luther King, Jr.".

SEC. 5. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) AUTHORIZATION.—Section 7 of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1474) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. There is authorized to be appropriated to carry out this Act $500,000 for each fiscal year.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) EXPENSES OF MEMBERS.—Section 4(d) of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1474) is amended by striking "subject to section 7" and inserting "subject to the availability of sufficient funds".

(2) PAY FOR STAFF.—Section 6(a) of Public Law 98-399 (98 Stat. 1474) is amended by striking "Subject to section 7" and inserting "Subject to the availability of sufficient funds".

DON'T HIKE FEDERAL GAS TAX

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, the Cleveland Plain Dealer recently ran an editorial by Bob Brown, former assistant director of the Ohio Department of Transportation, regarding a new Federal gas tax. Mr. Brown does an excellent job of pointing out the dangers of using a gas tax for Federal deficit reduction, and I would like to bring this information to the attention of my colleagues.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Jan. 14, 1989]

DON'T HIKE FEDERAL GAS TAX

(By Robert Clarke Brown)

What do Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford, Alan Greenspan and Paul Volcker have in common?

They all have found a painless way to put a big dent in the federal budget deficit. If only we would increase the federal gasoline tax by 25 cents, they say, we could reduce the deficit by $25 billion.

The gas tax is, as taxes go, a popular one. It is a potent revenue generator. And, by discouraging gasoline consumption, a higher tax might even pay a bit of an energy conservation dividend.

Sounds simple, right?

Like most get-rich-quick schemes, this one can't survive a closer look.

Despite the top-down leadership pushing for enactment of a gas tax for deficit reduction, there is substantial opposition to it. And for good reason, say groups like the National Governors Association. The tax would be regressive, hurting the poor more than the rich. It would be discriminatory, exacting more from those who, by virtue of their geographic location, must drive more. And, as a deficit reduction measure, it would be inefficient, depressing economic vitality and thereby producing countervailing increases in federal transfer payments and reductions in federal income tax revenues.

Leading the opposition to the tax are organizations representing every level of state and local government. In addition to the NGA, they include the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities and the U.S. Conference of Mayors. In their opposition lies another reason, perhaps the most important, for opposing the tax.

A federal gas tax for deficit reduction would disrupt a long-standing consensus about distribution of responsibilities and resources among the federal, state and local governments. In the American federal system, certain taxes are—either by law or by custom—the province of particular levels of government, and their revenues are linked to particular purposes.

For example, the property tax is a local tax, devoted in large measure to education, historically considered a primary function of local governments. Similarly, the fuel tax has been principally a state tax, levied to support transportation, a major responsibility of state government. In Ohio, that tax has been dedicated by the state constitution to transportation since 1948.

While the federal gas tax is now 9 cents, the average state tax on gasoline is significantly higher—14 cents. That is not surprising since, notwithstanding the large federal aid program of the last 30 years, it is, and always has been, the principal responsibility of the states to build and maintain the nation's highway system.

In Ohio, for example, 27,500 miles of highways are eligible to receive federal assistance for construction and capital maintenance (system preservation). To obtain that federal aid, the Ohio Department of Transportation or local governments must provide matching funds. In addition, ODOT and Ohio's local governments fund the full cost of construction and preservation for another 86,000 miles of roads. And ODOT and the locals pay 100% of all maintenance costs for every one of the 113,000 miles of highways, roads and streets in Ohio.

The principal funding source for all of this work is the state gas tax, currently 14.8 cents. ODOT's share of that revenue funds the entire ODOT highway program. Local governments get one-fourth of the fuel tax revenue, and although they typically have to supplement it with their general fund dollars, that revenue pays for much of their road program.

Today, states carrying out their transportation responsibilities face mounting needs. The American Association of State Highway and Transportation Officials estimates that annual highway expenditures by all levels of government need to increase approximately 20%, from $80 billion to $95 billion, just to maintain the system we have today. To provide the additional capacity demanded by economic growth, annual expenditures will need to rise to $117 billion.

The gasoline tax is based on the amount of gasoline purchased, not the price paid for it. Thus, it is not a sales tax, but a user fee. It is levied on taxpayers in proportion to the amount of gasoline they consume—and therefore the amount of driving they do. Those who use the highways more pay more.

The tax's popularity is no accident. Because it is a user fee, taxpayers feel they get what they pay for. If they need to use the road system frequently, they are willing to ante up and pay for that use.

In the early part of this decade, Americans began to recognize that their highway system needed both major expansion and substantial capital maintenance. To meet those needs, in 1982 they supported a 125% increase, from 4 cents to 9 cents, in the federal gasoline tax. Since that federal enactment, they have supported increases in the gasoline tax in 42 states, including Ohio, testimony to the strong political consensus such taxes enjoy when taxpayers are convinced their dollars will be well used.

If the integrity of the user fee is violated, however, that political support is likely to evaporate. When there is no longer a direct link between the amount of tax paid and the amount spent to take care of our transportation system, once-willing taxpayers may balk. And that will create big problems for the states.

In recent years, the Ohio General Assembly, like legislatures in other states, has approved increases in the gas tax to meet those needs. If the federal government preempts this potent revenue source with a large deficit-reduction tax, states are likely to encounter stiff resistance to additional increases. They will be hard-pressed to find the resources to meet their growing transportation needs.

At a time when the nation faces major transportation infrastructure needs, it can ill-afford to deprive those units of government that have primary responsibility for funding transportation—the states—of their principal resource for meeting those funding requirements, the gas tax.

When Russell Long chaired the Senate Finance Committee, he often enjoyed tweaking supplicants seeking special tax concessions with a little rhyme:

"Don't tax you, don't tax me.

"Tax that fellow behind the tree."

But state and local officials who oppose making a federal gas tax increase aren't looking for a "fellow behind the tree." They are simply facing squarely the major transportation problems that are theirs to deal with.

THE REASONABLE DETENTION OF ALIENS ACT

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, late last summer I read a story in the Washington Post that really disturbed me. The story was about a Salvadoran woman, with three young children, who was detained and sent to jail. The woman was nursing a 6-week-old infant who was suffering from a fever and an infection. The woman was detained when she went into the local immigration office for what she thought would be a routine interview. Authorities were planning to deport her on the next plane back to El Salvador.

This tragic episode took place in what is supposed to be the most humanitarian country in the world, the United States. It upsets me that our immigration service threats individuals who are seeking refuge in our country to escape oppression and violation of their human rights in such an insensitive way. This woman was no threat to society. She had maintained the same residence for 2 years. She had three dependent children, one of whom she was nursing. Yet the INS arrested her and separated her from her children.

This kind of inhumane treatment of individuals who are seeking refuge in our country should not happen. Today I am introducing legislation that will prohibit the INS from detaining a mother who is no threat to society and who has dependent children under 2 years old. It is my hope that this legislation will contribute to the debate of how our country treats human beings, citizens or refugees seeking protection and freedom.

The legislation I am introducing today is intended only to ensure that we treat people, regardless of their citizenship status, in a decent manner that is due all human beings.

H.R.—

A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to prevent the unreasonable detention of certain aliens with dependent children.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Reasonable Detention of Aliens Act".

SEC. 2. LIMITATION ON DETENTION OF CERTAIN ALIENS WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 242(c) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1252(c)) is amended—

(1) by striking "When" and inserting "(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), when"; and

(2) by inserting at the end the following new paragraph:

"(2)(A) The Attorney General shall not detain any alien described in subparagraph (B) who is deportable under section 241, except in connection with the immediate departure of such alien. The period of such detention shall not exceed a reasonable amount of time based upon the particular circumstances of the alien and his or her dependent children, not to exceed a 24-hour period.

"(B) An alien described in this subparagraph is an alien—

"(i) who is not deportable under paragraph (4), (5), (6), (7), (11), (12), (14), (15), (16), (17), (18), or (19) of section 241(a); and

"(ii) who is the mother of any child in the United States who is not older than 2 years of age and is dependent upon the alien for basic parental care.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made under subsection (a) shall apply to any alien subject to a final deportation order on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.

U.S. CHEMICAL INDUSTRY AT CRITICAL CROSSROAD

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the U.S. chemical industry is at an important crossroads. It is in a position to lead the world into the postchlorofluorocarbon era. That we are heading toward the end of using these ozone destroying chemicals is a certainty. The question is, How fast can we move.

I have introduced legislation which has more than 50 bipartisan cosponsors to impose an excise tax on the production of CFC's. This tax will make sure that price is not a factor in producing environmentally sensitive alternatives to CFC's. Currently, alternatives cost roughly triple the price of CFC's. The excise tax is good industrial policy by helping to ensure that U.S. industry is poised for the huge post-CFC market.

And it is a huge market. China alone is getting ready to provide its 1.1 billion people with refrigerators over the next 10 years.

The following article from the Washington Post provides some insight into the world CFC market. It points out pitfalls in trying to reduce CFC production. But most importantly, it points out the opportunities for U.S. industry to move as swiftly as possible to end CFC production.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 14, 1989]

THIRD WORLD DEMAND FOR CFCs RAISES WORRIES

(By Michael Weisskopf)

In the mid-1980s, Pennwalt Corp. caught hold of Asia's rising expectations. The Philadelphia chemical company agreed to teach firms in India and Taiwan how to produce a family of gases that had revolutionized life styles in the developed world and promised the same for Asia.

Now, even before the plants have opened, Pennwalt is encouraging the firms in Taiwan and India to convert to substitutes for the gases. An era is over for chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs).

The sales pitch changed along with the scientific consensus on CFCs. Once hallowed for their safety and low cost, CFCs have been used as insulation for refrigerators, sterilants for medical equipment, and the infinite variety of plastic foam shapes of a throwaway culture.

In the "have not" nations, a clamor is growing for cheap consumer goods made with CFCs, and CFC manufacturers are under pressure to meet the Third World demand.

But CFCs are now regarded as a major environmental danger, a threat to the band of ozone that encircles the globe and screens out harmful ultraviolet radiation.

That radiation unchecked would be so perilous to life on Earth that most industrial nations and CFC producers, such as Pennwalt, have agreed on the goal—if not the timing—of a total phase-out of production.

As representatives of 124 nations gathered in London last week to discuss the common threat, U.S. and European delegates pushed for a CFC ban by the turn of the century. Forty countries have pledged to halve their production by 1998 in a treaty effective July 1.

But few of the large developing nations have ratified the treaty, and environmental diplomats worry that demand there will more than offset controls elsewhere.

The pact tries to accommodate economic growth pains by permitting Third World parties to increase their use of CFCs to two-thirds of a pound per citizen—more than 10 times current consumption in Asia, Africa and Latin America, but only 27 percent of U.S. per capita use, according to Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) figures.

But a World Resources Institute study showed that if just four countries—China, India, Indonesia and Brazil—reached that ceiling, world use of CFCs would rise 50 percent—even if every developed nation halved its consumption.

Unlike other pollutants, CFCs do not break down in the lower atmosphere. They float 15 miles above ground, disintegrate in the intense solar radiation and gobble up the ozone layer that prevents skin cancer, cataracts, global warming and crop damage. Every one percent depletion of ozone causes an extra 35,000 U.S. skin cancers over 75 years, according to the EPA.

While CFC makers are required by the treaty to halve their production for domestic use, they can boost output for exports by 10 percent annually to satisfy Third World demand and to discourage start-up of CFC plants there.

But CFC makers are being urged to use restraint. Sen. John H. Chafee (R-R.I.) wrote last week to the three major U.S. CFC producers—Pennwalt, E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. and Allied Signal Inc.—noting that production by their facilities in nonsignatory nations would "undermine substantially" the treaty.

Irving Mintzer of World Resources said CFC producers should encourage less-developed countries to rely on substitutes.

Pennwalt agreed to sell CFC technology to Indian and Taiwanese firms in 1985 and 1986, before scientists reported growth in the ozone "hole" over Antarctica and the 3 percent depletion over populated parts of Europe and North America. In recent months, Pennwalt has offered a CFC substitute to the Asian firms that is 95 percent less damaging to ozone than the substances they learned how to produce, according to Peter Miller, managing director of Pennwalt's CFC division.

"We're doing everything we can do to get these people to modify their plants," Miller said. The Taiwanese and Indians, he said, are "taking a wait-and-see attitude."

Meanwhile, China has sought to buy CFC technology from Pennwalt, but the firm rejected the request, Miller said. The communist regime in Beijing has promised to equip its population of more than 1 billion with refrigerators by the year 2000.

Du Pont, the world's largest CFC supplier, is considering helping China produce a CFC substitute, said Tony Volgelsberg, environmental manager in Du Pont's Freon division. The firm has pledged to phase out production of CFCs by early next century at U.S. plants as well as at subsidiaries in Brazil, Argentina, Mexico, Japan and the Netherlands, Vogelsberg said.

He said that while Du Pont will not sell technology for CFCs, it will continue to export the substance to the Third World within treaty limits. "It's necessary to prevent them from building their own CFC plants," he said.

Allied spokesman William Corcoran said his firm will continue Third World exports but will not transfer CFC technology.

At the London conference, China and India called for financial and technological aid from industrial countries as a condition for signing the treaty. U.S. officials have asked the World Bank and the U.S. foreign aid program to consider such aid, according to an EPA official.

WOMEN OF SACRAMENTO

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the celebration of the opening of "Women of Sacramento," an exhibition and awards program honoring the women of Sacramento, "carved out of the past, shaping the present, molding the future." This exhibition is an appropriate tribute to women, past and present, who have enriched the lives of the people of Sacramento by sharing their ideals with the community.

I commend the Sacramento History Center Association and all those who have contributed their time, skills, and dedication to create this exhibition. This exhibition is not only a tribute to these historical and contemporary women, it is also a gift to the people of Sacramento as it further acquaints them with their rich heritage both past and present.

The awards program is endowed with special esteem for it honors 8 modern-day women of Sacramento that personify vision, initiative, determination, courage, philanthropy, steadfastness, heritage, heroism, and match their achievements with those of their foremothers. Their profound sense of integrity and dedication to seeing those principles manifested in their community has enabled them to transform these ideals into realities.

The honorees include: Sister Claire Graham and Sister Catherine Connell in the vision category for establishing Wellspring Women's Center; Sandra Orizco in the initiative category for founding WEAVE [Women Escaping a Violent Environment]; Barbara Anne Weidner in the determination category for organizing Grandmothers for Peace; Mayor Anne Rudin in the courage category for pursuing good government; Margaret "Mama" Marks for philanthropy with a food-and-clothing program for the needy; Emma Gunterman for steadfastness as an advocate for children, consumers, and low-income people; Beth Murphy Engs for heritage in preserving the historic Rhoades School in Elk Grove; and Mary Tsukamoto for heroism for her work on behalf of Japanese-Americans interned in the United States during World War II.

Mr. Speaker, I can think of no greater honor than to be recognized by your peers and your community for outstanding service. I ask that my colleagues join me in saluting these Women of Sacramento for their history-making achievements and for their significant contributions to shaping the future of Sacramento.

NORTH TRIAL: WRONG MAN, WRONG ISSUE

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, it is a disturbing fact that some actions by governmental officials have the effect, if not the intent, of treason.

If a future Gibbon ever chronicles the decline of the American Empire he will note that unelected bureaucrats at the State Department managed to undermine U.S. foreign policy to an extent that almost justified suspicions of their motives. A more contemporary chronicle comes to us from Cal Thomas, whose recent syndicated column on the subject was printed in the March 5 issue of the Saratogian, in my congressional district.

Mr. Speaker, I would go further than Mr. Thomas by indicting Congress as a coconspirator. But let it be noted for the record that at the same time Marxist thugs are consolidating their tyranny in Nicaragua and preparing to spread their poison to their neighbors, at the same time Congress and the State Department have weakened the United States role in Central America, perhaps irreversibly, one former Marine Corps lieutenant colonel has become the fall guy.

Congress and the State Department, not Oliver North, should be on trial for disobeying orders, subverting the Constitution, and condemning millions to communism.

It is my pleasure to place the Cal Thomas column in today's RECORD.

[From the Saratoga Springs (NY) Saratogian, Mar. 5, 1989]

NORTH TRIAL: WRONG MAN, WRONG ISSUE

(By Cal Thomas)

On the opening day of the Oliver North trial, the New York Times editorialized on why the trial should proceed: "It is the need to uphold anew the principle that even the Commander in Chief has a commander in chief: the law."

A Washington Post editorial the same day said, "If Congress can be defied with impunity by selected parts of the executive branch, then the system does break down."

This was the same New York Times that reported in June, 1979, on the Nicaraguan Sandinistas, "A doctor . . . praised the young rebels. 'They're not Communists,' he said. 'That's a fairy tale that Somoza invented and only the National Guard believes.' "

This was the same Washington Post which wrote just days after the Sandinista-led government took power July 19, 1979, "The new (Sandinista laws) project the new government as highly moralistic, concerned about state security, politically liberal in a social democratic mold."

The Post and the Times turned out to be wrong about the Sandinistas, just as they are wrong in their conclusion about the North trial.

As former Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs Constantine Menges has written in his powerful new book, "Inside the National Security Council," it was the State Department, assisted by several spineless people in key positions at the White House, that opened the door to the Iran-Contra affair, for which Oliver North is now the primary fall guy.

In the military, if one defies an order from a superior, one may be court-martialed. In civilian life, disobedience to the boss's instruction can get you fired. But in government, the State Department may disregard, circumvent and countermand the foreign policy of the elected Commander in Chief and suffer no consequences, save the weakening of the presidency and the auctioning of freedom to Communist tyrants in exchange for unfulfilled dreams of "peace."

Naming names, places and dates, Menges documents the cunning and dishonest methods used by everyone from former Secretary of State George Shultz and others on down and indicts them (no one else will) for pursuing a policy of their own in direct violation of specific instructions to the contrary from Ronald Reagan. Menges shows clearly that the foreign policy establishment at State believes no one else better understands how the world should work than they do, and that some career foreign service officers view the president of the United States as simply a caretaker, while State has been endowed with the unalienable right to shape the world as it desires.

Menges reveals how then-U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick had her credibility cut from under her when, in early 1983, she carried a personal letter from President Reagan to each of the friendly heads of state in Central America. Upon returning to Washington, Kirkpatrick learned that Assistant Secretary of State for Latin America Thomas Enders had sent an "eyes only" cable to all the U.S. ambassadors in the region, instructing them to ignore Kirkpatrick (and by implication, the president), because a new Central American strategy was being prepared and would be passed along as soon as Shultz returned from a trip to China.

There were secret meetings between officials at State and Nicaraguan dictator Daniel Ortega, in violation of procedures that required a review of all such meetings by the president and National Security Council.

Menges tells of elaborate schemes to block meetings of the NSC which, when held, almost always resulted in the president rejecting the policy initiatives of Shultz and the State Department and opting for policies that would advance the cause of freedom and democracy in Central America.

The Menges book is by far more important than the North trial. It provides prima facie evidence that the State Department has been, and is, running and ruining the foreign policy of the United States. It is bad enough that severe damage was done to that policy during the Reagan years. It is even worse that some of those responsible for this shameless and what would in wartime be considered treasonous behavior are now, or will soon be, at the highest levels of the Department of State.

FREE RAOUL WALLENBERG

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Raoul Wallenberg and to call upon General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev to tell us the fate of this brave individual.

Raoul Wallenberg is a shining figure from a very dark time in history. He was a man of tremendous courage and imagination. In the closing days of World War II he traveled from Sweden to German-occupied Hungary at the request of the United States. Using every resource available to him as a Swedish diplomat, Raoul Wallenberg saved as many as 100,000 Hungarian Jews from Nazi death camps.

Yet, when the Soviet Red Army swept into Hungary they did not reward or honor Raoul Wallenberg for his valiant and successful efforts. Instead, after Stalin's Red Army entered Budapest, Wallenberg went to meet Soviet officers to get aid for the Jews. They arrested him and he disappeared into the dark world of the gulag.

Mr. Speaker, for 50 years Raoul Wallenberg, a hero of the fight to save individuals and the world from Nazi terror and hatred, has been a prisoner in the Soviet Union.

We do not know Raoul Wallenberg's fate. I call again upon General Secretary Gorbachev to tell us what happened to this international hero. Glasnost is meaningless if we are not told the truth about Raoul Wallenberg.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR CONGRESSIONAL AFFIRMATION OF THE PRESIDENTIAL PROCLAMATION EXTENDING THE TERRITORIAL SEA FROM 3 TO 12 MILES

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, on December 27, 1988, President Ronald Reagan issued a Presidential proclamation to extend the territorial sea from 3 to 12 miles for international purposes.

President Reagan's action extending the territorial sea is consistent with international law and will have important national security benefits. This change, for example, will mean that Soviet surveillance submarines will be 9 miles farther off our coasts; and it will give the United States sovereignty and jurisdiction that extend to the air space over the territorial sea as well as to its bed and subsoil. As a national security and international legal matter, this extension of the territorial sea makes eminent sense.

I am introducing this legislation today to have Congress reaffirm this important action and to ensure that its effect on domestic law is entirely clear. This bill provides that the proclamation will not effect the rights and obligations of States, U.S. territories, or Federal agencies under existing domestic law; for example, following this proclamation the definition of the term "coastal zone" under the Coastal Zone Management Act remains the same with a seaward limit of 3 miles from the shore.

HONORING PROF. PAUL TAKAGI

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to honor Prof. Paul Takagi on the occasion of his retirement from the faculty of the School of Education.

I have admired Paul since I have come to know him and his work in the last two decades. Like many in this, and the larger community, we have counted on his knowledge, his training, his wisdom, and his ability to articulate the critical issues and problems about the justice and penal system in the United States.

For all of Paul's apparent dignity and reserve, he was one—the other was Tony Platt—of two faculty members of the School of Criminology who were so threatening that it brought about the elimination of that school by then Gov. Ronald Reagan. The School of Criminology was created after World War II and had a national reputation as one of the best schools in the discipline.

The school was a heady place to be in the sixties because some of the faculty and so many students were involved in serving the interests of the community and in working toward a just criminal justice system. Many saw the system's racist practices as a prime evil and worked to express these as well as to call for other reforms in the prison system. Paul was active in developing support for civilian review boards and other forms of community-based police accountability.

As I mentioned earlier, this must have been very disturbing. First, they tried to fire Professor Takagi; when that failed, they closed the school. Now, you know that he had to have done something really impressive to warrant that reaction.

As a professor in the School of Education, he continues to serve as a consultant not only on these concerns but also on the training of police personnel in their relations with members of communities other than the white, upper, or middle class.

He is a leading consultant and investigator on the problems of racism within police departments, and has served Government agencies as well community organizations, like the Urban League and the late Supervisor John George, to develop solutions.

When he is not directly threatening the establishment, he is a member of the editorial board of the Social Justice Journal—formerly Crime and Social Justice—since its founding in the early 1970's. This is the leading progressive journal in criminal justice in the United States.

Professor Takagi is a much honored, beloved, and treasured member of the Asian American community. His incarceration in Manzinar Camp during World War II places him in the heart of the Asian American experience and gives him the personal insight into one manifestation of racism in our culture.

After his release, he worked as a probation officer in Los Angeles County and then as a parole officer in San Quentin. He extended that experience by getting a Ph.D. in sociology at Stanford.

I count myself as one of the fortunate people who have the pleasure and the honor of knowing this man. May he continue to have a spiritually rich and creative life.

HONORING VOLUNTEER FIREFIGHTERS AND RESCUE SQUAD MEMBERS

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce today my cosponsorship of legislation which has been introduced by my colleague THOMAS DOWNEY of New York providing a tax credit of $100 to volunteer firefighters or volunteer rescue squad members.

For nearly 200 years volunteer firefighters have filled a critical need in our communities, Mr. Speaker. This need is especially important in suburban and rural areas like those I represent in Bucks and Montgomery Counties in southeastern Pennsylvania.

Volunteers in communities from one end of my district to the other—from Perkasie in the north, to Levittown in the south, from Yardley and Morrisville in the east, to Warminster and Warrington in the west—are serving their communities in vital ways by fighting fires, providing emergency medical assistance, and taking stricken neighbors to local hospitals in rescue vehicles.

But as the population of many of these suburban and rural communities rises, Mr. Speaker, so does the need for additional volunteers to meet the rising number of emergencies. And the fact is, the number of volunteer firefighters is declining in many communities.

Therefore, along with Mr. DOWNEY and several of our colleagues, I am pleased to cosponsor legislation which will provide a modest inducement for volunteers to serve in these critical rescue and firefighting roles. This legislation, the Volunteer Firefighters Tax Credit Act of 1989 (H.R. 1054), will allow firefighters and rescue personnel to take a $100 tax credit each year on their Federal income tax returns.

This tax credit is merited, Mr. Speaker, for a number of reasons. First, the contribution made by volunteers saves local townships and municipalities the great expense of funding professional companies to respond to fire and emergencies. Second, volunteers inevitably incur out-of-pocket expenses, for essentials such as clothing, equipment, and transportation, for which they are not reimbursed. The tax credit would help defray these costs.

Mr. Speaker, just as the Federal Government recognized the significant contributions of volunteer firefighters by providing a death benefit for those killed in the line of duty, so I believe the Federal Government can help local communities through this modest tax support for these public safety volunteers. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 1054, the Volunteer Firefighters Tax Credit Act of 1989.

A PROFILE IN COURAGE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with our colleagues a story of a remarkable woman, a woman who has never allowed her personal tragedy to get the best of her. Verna Thomas was one of the many thousands of Americans who were struck with poliomyelitis in the early 1950's. She lost both her children to the disease and has been confined to a respirator for more than 35 years.

In spite of her disabling condition, she has lived her life spreading happiness and encouragement; she has been an inspiration to everyone who has known her. Surgery has left her without lungs and larynx. The paralyzing effect of polio left her with only limited use of her hands. Yet, she has many visitors and energetically participates in her convalescent hospital activities. She enjoys writing and helps publish the Bel Vista Newsletter. She maintains pen pals around the world.

Verna has an insatiable appetite for knowledge and keeps abreast of local, national, and international news. She enjoys sharing opinions and a good debate.

Verna Thomas epitomizes the tens of thousands of disabled Americans who enrich the lives of those around them and have led their lives to the fullest extent possible. Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the RECORD her brief autobiography as written for the March issue of the Bel Vista Newsletter. It is a moving story of hope and courage.

Verna Thomas' autobiography follows:

LIFE OF VERNA THOMAS

One brisk nippy day, February 20, 1926, in a red brick hospital located in Northern California, in the small town called Yreka a set of twins were born, first came Vera Rae and five minutes later Verna Fae came into the world. Since our mother was very ill she was unable to go home with us, so our Grandmothers from both sides of the family brought us home to care for us.

Our folks lived on a ranch that had been passed on down for five generations. They raised cattle, sheep, hogs, chickens and turkeys. Our first bed was a large wicker basket and we laid feet to feet. Everything went fine till we started crawling and walking, that's when trouble began. Since we were identical and inseparable we kept everyone busy trying to keep us out of everything.

There was no electricity so kerosene lamps and lanterns were used for light as well as kitchen stove and washing machine. Had cold running water but no hot so it was heated on the stove, till the kerosene stove blew up, and was replaced with a Home Comfort wood stove which had a reservoir on the side to heat the water. Since there was no bathroom we took our bath behind the old wood stove in a galvanized tub. The outhouse had a well worn path running to it and needless to say, in the winter time no one stayed very long, and in the summer time it was rather scary at night, when the coyotes would sing their little song.

Time passed on and one day, about the age of four or five years, we decided we wanted to do some horse back riding, so we found a short piece of barbed wire, climbed over the fence, caught the saddle horse, led him up to the fence, wire around his neck, and we took turns leading and riding him till we were discovered, and that was the end of our ride for that day and some time to come.

Well it was about time to learn the 3R's and the nearest school house was one or two miles from the ranch. The school house had one room in which all eight grades were taught. Just a short ways from the school house there was a small shed where the horses were kept as some of the students rode horse back to school. Our folks took us to school most of the time, but we most always walked home picking wild flowers as we went, and springing traps that the ranchers had set to catch coyotes which were preying on their livestock, till we got caught.

At that time the harvesting and haying were done by horses, but later on our father bought a tractor. Our folks owned a Model T Ford and riding on the running board was a thrill of a life time.

As the years rolled by the small school house that we attended was closed because of lack of students, so we were transferred to another one room school house, and that too had to be closed, so we finished grammar school in the little town of Montague.

All the years we were growing up our Mother made all our clothes and also made bread, butter, canned fruit and vegetables, and cured our own meat. We also learned to do the same things. We learned to drive the team of horses to feed cattle in the winter, and bring hay from the fields to the barns during haying season. As we grew older we had more responsibilities, like herding sheep and cattle, and since we were taking piano lessons we had to practice two or more hours a day.

When our father acquired a truck, we learned to drive to feed cattle and haul grain sacks in the harvesting season. We liked to dare one another to see how high up the mountain either of us could get before the truck started sliding side ways or started to tip over, or see how many sacks of grain we could pile on the truck and not have any of them fall off on our way to the storage bins.

We entered high school in Yreka during the early Forties, and caught the bus that traveled many miles down out of the mountains and passed the ranch on the way to school, which was another eight miles. World War II was in full swing and we did everything to help the war effort. When vacations came we helped our Father with the haying, harvesting, and took turns driving tractor and tending header on the harvester.

All through school we were in sports, cheer leaders, glee club and also sang and played duets on the piano for different organizations.

We graduated from Yreka High School in 1944 at which time I met a young man who was in the Air Force, stationed in Medford, Oregon. We were married in 1945 at my folk's ranch. In 1946 he was discharged as the war was over and so we packed our grips and loaded our belongings in an old second hand Dodge four door sedan and headed for Milwaukee, Wis. We lived with his folks for a few years of which time our son and daughter were born. In 1949 we again decided to move back to California where we settled in Sacramento. We lived in a modest two bedroom house.

In November of 1951 tragedy struck our little family which changed our lives forever. My two children and myself contracted Polio, my two children died and I was in an Iron Lung for some time. Later a rocking bed and a chest respirator. In 1952 I was transferred by ambulance to the old section of Rancho Los Amigos in Downey, California. That was a trip I'll never forget. When I needed to be suctioned we had to find a service station to plug my suction machine in to use it. As we went through each town or city we had a police escort, which was very noisy to say the least. Before we arrived at our destination my respirator stopped working so it was either sink or swim and I wasn't about to give up, I made it but there was one nurse and two ambulance drivers who were sweating it out since I didn't have any back up.

In 1954 the new buildings of Rancho Los Amigos Respiratory Center, as it was known at that time were finished, so one foggy, cold morning they put us in our chairs, loaded us on an open air truck and transferred us to the new buildings across the highway. In 1958 I was transferred to the Foothill San. located out in the valley. In 1959 I was transferred again back to Rancho because of illness. In 1960 after my lung surgery I was sent to Temple City. I remained there for over two years and problems started to occur with the nursing staff, so I asked for a transfer to Bel Vista in Long Beach. In the mean time while waiting for the transfer, one of the nurses offered to bring me down to see what Bel Vista looked like and visit with some of the Polios who were already here. Everything went along fine till we started back and got lost in the mountains and my respirator stopped working. Well since there was just us two, my nurse would stop now and then and give me some air by my hand resuscitator then drive on again till we managed to flag down a patrol car to help us through the traffic, but who instead took us to a fire station where we had quite a time trying to convince them that it wasn't oxygen I needed, but for someone to hand pump my resuscitator. I don't think they really understood but any way they finally agreed to have one of the firemen drive her car while she pumped my resuscitator, so with the police car in front of us and a fire truck behind us, we made it back safe and sound. Then in 1963 I was transferred to Bel Vista where I've remained ever since.

Over the years I have made many friends of which I've been very fortunate in being able to keep in touch with over the years.

I want to take this time to thank Eleanor Sanchez for all her help with my ups and downs, and she has become a special person to me.

I also want to thank all the Administrators of Bel Vista for allowing me to have some of my personal belongings in my room, since Bel Vista has been more or less my home away from home, since I have been here for over twenty five years.

A MOVING TRIBUTE TO THREE FALLEN WARRIORS IN THE WAR AGAINST TERRORISM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with my colleagues a memorable and touching tribute paid to three young Foreign Service officers who recently gave their lives in the war against terrorism. These fine men perished, along with many other Americans, in the tragic sabotaging of Pan Am 103 over Scotland. My heart goes out to the families and loved ones of Matthew Kevin Gannon, Daniel Emmett O'Conner, and Ronald Albert Lariviere. Three eagles have fallen, but their dedication and service to country will never be forgotten.

The war against terrorism will not be won in one final and decisive battle. Nor will it be won in the near future. Victory over terrorism will take time, patience, and perseverance. Someday the free world will succeed in isolating the practitioners and containing the ravages of this international menace. Unfortunately, this ongoing struggle will continue to claim the lives of other young men who bravely march forward to defend their nation. This is a price that we must be willing to pay to maintain the freedom that we all enjoy.

I commend my colleagues to the following memorial service eulogy by the Assistant Secretary of State for Diplomatic Security, Robert E. Lamb, at St. Patricks Cathedral in January of this year. While words can do little to soften the anguish which their families now feel, Mr. Lamb effectively captures the deep commitment which these fine Americans had to our country, and the terrible tragedy of their untimely loss:

MEMORIAL SERVICE REMARKS BY ASSISTANT SECRETARY LAMB

For the 1,400 men and women of the Bureau of Diplomatic Security, this is a day of sadness and of irony. The Bureau was born out of our nation's commitment to protect all of the people who would do our nation's work abroad. It is a world in which DS has made a difference. It touches us deeply, therefore, to gather here today to mourn the lives of young men who dedicated their lives to protecting others.

These men represent the highest traditions of government service—America's best Ron Lariviere and Dan O'Connor were special agents. They had survived rigorous screening and a tough examination process to be selected from thousands of applicants for Diplomatic Security. As special agents, they were put through extensive training. Both endured long hours and demanding assignments to prepare them for the future—and their future was bright indeed.

Matthew Gannon was especially close to us in DS. The younger brother of our own Special Agent Richard Gannon, he worked closely with us as a political officer in Beirut, his last post. So on both accounts, we consider him a member of our family.

All three of these men had volunteered for their last assignments, accepting without question, the dangers of their work—and dangerous it is.

The Foreign Service and the Department of State are for many of us like an extended family. But the members of the Diplomatic Security Service share a special bond drawn from the nature of our work, the frequent and difficult travel, the shift work, and the long hours.

Our families are often asked to make great sacrifices to accommodate our jobs. There are too many missed birthdays, and anniversaries; too many occasions when our wives and husbands have carried more than their share of the family responsibilities because we were unable to do our part; too many disappointments for our children when our work made it impossible for us to be there for the special moments in their lives. Our families grow accustomed to the sacrifices and accept them with love and understanding. Today, we are reminded how great those sacrifices can ultimately be.

We can almost count in months the time since these men arrived in Washington to start new careers in government. They left behind the beauty of the California coast, and the charm of old New England. They left behind admiring neighbors, and loving families. They entered a new world enthusiastically and bravely. Now, we can say to them: You have left us for a world we cannot pretend to understand. But you have left behind you here much that is good.

Matthew Kevin Gannon, Daniel Emmett O'Conner, Ronald Albert Lariviere—we are proud of you. We shall miss you.

GROVES IS "MR. BASKETBALL"

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to salute the East Robertson High School basketball team, and in particular a young man who has worked very hard during the past 4 years. His hard work and dedication culminated in him receiving the highest honor that can be awarded by the Tennessee Secondary Schools Athletic Association.

Carlus Groves of East Robertson High School has been selected as the TSSAA's "Mr. Basketball" for class A basketball teams in Tennessee by a vote of coaches in that division.

Carlus, who has signed a letter of intent to play college basketball with the University of Tennessee, has accomplished numerous goals and gathered respect through extreme personal adversity.

East Robertson principal Mark Stubblefield noted the strength and quality of character Carlus has displayed, saying:

Despite the hardships and personal adversity Carlus has endured, he has fostered an admirable attitude and maintained a positive spirit that has been an inspiration to his fellow teammates, students, the school faculty and administration, and the entire community.

Regardless of the fame Carlus achieves in the future by playing basketball, or in any endeavor, he has already overcome obstacles few peers ever face, and developed a sense of responsibility, character, and pride that will serve him through life's challenges.

Helping lead his basketball team to two State championships was quite a feat, but when you consider the other struggles Carlus has faced, you can understand how his biggest victories were really not on a basketball court.

I sincerely hope every colleague in the U.S. House of Representatives, every basketball fan, and every person who comprehends the true challenges in life, will recognize what this young man has achieved.

I have enclosed a copy of an article from the Robertson County Times providing more details about the award Carlus received. I hope my colleagues will take the opportunity to read about this exceptional young man.

[From the Robertson County Times, Mar. 2, 1989]

EAST'S GROVES STATE MR. BASKETBALL

East Robertson senior Carlus Groves has been selected TSSAA "Mr. Basketball" in Class A by a vote of coaches in that division.

It is the highest honor in the state for a boys basketball player.

"We are extremely proud of Carlus, and this is a great achievement," said East Robertson Coach David Collie.

Groves is the second East player to be named "Mr. Basketball" in three years. Guard Fitz Jones earned the award two years ago.

The Class AA winner is Chattanooga City High's Orlando Lightfoot. In Class AAA, the winner is Darrell Miller of Oak Ridge.

In the girls division, all three winners were from the Midstate area: Collinwood's Mia Daniel in Class A; Cannon County's Julie Powell in AA; and Shelbyville's Misty Lamb in AAA.

Groves is 6-7, 235 pounds and lives in Cross Plains, Tenn.

A University of Tennessee signee, he has scored over 2,000 points in his career and averages 22 points per game and 14.8 rebounds. He has a 62 percent field goal average.

Groves was all-state tournament in 1987 and 1988, and most valuable player in the state tournament in 1988. East has won the Class A state boys basketball tournament in both 1987 (with Jones also) and 1988.

In his three years, East has won 99 games against only six losses.

Collie is extremely proud of Groves' development as a basketball player. "He's gotten mentally tougher since he got here," said Collie. "When he came in our school as a sophomore, there were a lot of little things he needed to work on, and he has."

There's an old saying, "if you're injured, you can't play, but if you're in pain, there are times you have to play," said Collie. "Carlus has certainly improved in that area."

The coach notes that in a crucial game against Page this year, Groves had four fouls early in the fourth quarter.

"Tyrone Dotson (another East player) came to me and said, 'You've got to leave him in, coach.' We did because we had to have him to win. Carlus didn't foul out. He's learned to pace himself to stay in the game."

Collie says that this year has been tough on Groves who has taken a great deal of physical and mental abuse for being a big man, a big star and a UT signee.

"He's taken more than his share of knocks this year," said Collie. "He's done a good job not to retaliate. He's not always perfect, but he's kept himself under control in some very tough situations."

Collie says this year's team is more emotional than Indian teams of the past. Groves has often been in the eye of the storm.

"I was listening to a talk show the other night, and a UT fan said he'd seen the East-Springfield game and was complaining that Carlus was lazy," said Collie.

"I say, watch what Carlus does when the game is on the line," said Collie. "The object is to win, we want to win. We're not preparing Carlus for Tennessee basketball. That's Don DeVoe's job."

Collie says that Groves plays well within his system. Is he the best player Collie has ever coached?

"It all depends on what you mean by 'best,' he's obviously my best big man," said Collie. "Lee Blakemore was a better shooter, Wayne Cook better in the clutch, maybe, Fitz Jones a better team leader.

"But, as a Division I prospect with size and overall ability, he's the best player I've ever coached."

Collie noted that Groves, whose father was killed last spring and whose mother suffers from a stroke, faces many pressures off the court.

"A lot of kids have chores at home, but Carlus and his brother, Thomas, have real responsibilities at home," said Collie. "I admire his ability to handle that. And, it's hard for him because he often doesn't have some family member at the game the way other kids do."

Collie says that Groves' goal was not to win the 'Mr. Basketball' title even though he knew he was favored after winning the MVP at the state last year.

"His goal has been for the team to win the state title again," said Collie. "Mr. Basketball hasn't been on his mind. He wants to go back to the state, and why not, it's the only thing he knows."

WHAT I WOULD HAVE TOLD THE HOWARD STUDENTS

HON. LARRY E. CRAIG

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the election of 1988 proved that Republicans have made great stides in recruiting thousands of new voters. People who traditionally have called themselves "Democrats" have made the switch. They saw the far-left factions dominating their party and contrasted it with our vibrant GOP team and made a simple decision—they defected to a political camp which better represents mainstream American ideals and beliefs. And the Republican National Committee, with Lee Atwater at the helm, is going to carry that message to thousands more.

I only regret that the emotionally charged students at Howard University failed to recognize the things which our party's new chairman and the GOP really represent. And it is their loss. However, I commend chairman Atwater's response to the Howard students which was published in the March 10 edition of the Washington Post. I only hope that the students will take the time to read his message and realize the opportunities our party offers.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that you include the RNC chairman's article to be printed in the RECORD immediately followingt my remarks.

[From the Washington Post]

WHAT I WOULD HAVE TOLD THE HOWARD STUDENTS

(By Lee Atwater)

On Tuesday I resigned from the Howard University Board of Trustees. I did so with deep regret. The board had honored me with its support, and I looked forward to serving the students and the community as a trustee of this outstanding historically black university.

I must confess that the idea of serving on Howard's board would never have occurred to me. But when Howard President James Cheek informed me that I was a unanimous choice to join that board, I was excited by the prospect—excited because I believed that I could be helpful to the university in fund raising, scholarship endowment, identifying job opportunities for graduates and in scholastic opportunities such as student internships at the White House and the Republican National Committee. I was especially pleased that I could help bring money into a university the overwhelming majority of whose students depend on tuition assistance to get their education.

The fact is, I had a lot to offer Howard, and the idea of serving a distinguished university known for its academic diversity and respect for the free exchange of ideas appealed greatly to me.

Despite what some of my critics say, I did not, as chairman of the Republican National Committee, expect to come to Howard with unanimous support from the student body. But I did expect to have a chance—a chance not only to prove my sincerity in reaching out, but also to show that I could deliver for Howard. What I regret most is that I was not given that opportunity.

But I'm also disappointed there wasn't an open dialogue between myself and the individuals who took possession of the Howard University Administration Building to protest, among other things, my election to the board. Many things were said about me and my positions on issues, and with few exceptions they were either totally wrong or completely distorted. I wanted a chance to clear the air, to set the record straight and above all to address the concerns and issues some of the students had raised.

I met with two groups of students when the commotion over my service on the board first began. Both groups, including the elected representatives of the Howard University Student Associations, asked me about the issues that concerned them. They asked about my philosophy on civil rights, about some of the inflammatory things being said about me, and I answered all of their questions. I sought that same opportunity with the student protesters by asking for a meeting with them. Unfortunately, they expressed no interest in meeting with me. Instead, the student associations sent me a questionnaire to answer. I was prepared to comply, but the board and Dr. Cheek thought that it would be inappropriate for me to do so. They were concerned that it would create a precedent for other board members, so I honored their wish. I made it clear, though, that I would sit down with interested parties and—point by point—respond to the issues raised in the questionnaire. That opportunity never materialized.

When the situation at Howard grew more tense, and police were poised to forcibly enter the administration building, I worried about the safety of the students. No matter how important the issue of having my day in court was to me, I did not want someone hurt at my expense. So I resigned, hoping to bring an end to the standoff.

But the message I wanted to deliver to those students—and in fact to all students at Howard—was never addressed. And I'm sorry they missed that opportunity because it was one I think they would have embraced. It was a message best summed up in the platform of the Republican Party, which says: "We support the worth of every person. We support the pluralism and diversity that have been part of our country's greatness. . . . Bigotry has no place in American life. We denounce those persons, organizations, publications and movements which practice or promote racism, anti-Semitism or religious intolerance." Had the students in the administration building been listening, this is also what they would have heard:

I supported the Voting Rights Act extension, and I advised both President Reagan and Sen. Strom Thurmond, who was chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee at the time, to support it as well. Both of them supported the bill.

I support affirmative action in its traditional sense: affirmative recruiting efforts and other initiatives designed to help the victims of discrimination. Where there is a history of discrimination, the government and the courts should work to help individuals who were harmed, but not by extending broad-based preferences based solely on race or sex. I have, in fact, instituted a voluntary program to bring more minorities and women into the RNC in leadership roles.

I oppose apartheid in South Africa as morally bankrupt. I support an immediate end to it and the establishment in South Africa of democratic majority rule.

Literature asserting that I opposed the 1964 Civil Rights Act is wrong. When that historic legislation was debated and approved by Congress, I was in the seventh grade.

Regarding to the so-called Willie Horton issue, let me be clear: the ad in question was an independent and unauthorized effort. In fact, Campaign Chairman James A. Baker III and I both wrote to the group responsible for it demanding that it be discontinued. But the issue was never Willie Horton the man. It was the program that allowed him and other convicted murderers out of Massachusetts' prisons for unsupervised weekend furloughs after being sentenced to life without parole. This program, which Gov. Dukakis strongly supported, made no sense. The idea of allowing a convicted first degree murderer with no chance of parole to leave prison on weekends violated common sense, not to mention the precepts of the criminal justice system. The issue is especially relevant because only Massachusetts allowed furloughs for convicts serving life without parole terms. It should also be noted that the Massachusetts prison furlough issue was first raised during the Democratic primaries by Sen. Al Gore, who criticized Gov. Dukakis for supporting the program.

Finally, I wanted to make it clear that I share the vision of George Bush spelled out in a speech last year to the NAACP. "Who we are as a people can be measured by how we uphold and defend the rights of all," he said. "And it is our willingness to respect and uphold these rights—even when it is difficult—that sets America apart from every other nation on Earth."

I leave the Howard board with no bitterness. In fact, the situation has only strengthened my resolve to continue reaching out and to move forward with my efforts to broaden the base of the Republican Party. We have a good message—a message of equal opportunity and strong values that are shared by all Americans. The Howard incident served only to underscore what I already knew: while the road toward broadening our party may be bumpy, it is a road we must travel nonetheless.

SENIORS SHOULD BEWARE OF HUCKSTERS TRYING TO SELL TAX EXEMPT BONDS TO AVOID MEDICARE SUPPLEMENTAL PREMIUM

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, seniors across the Nation are being flooded with solicitation from investment "advisers," who are more than not, giving very bad advice. These hucksters are trying to scare seniors into believing that they will all owe enormous amounts of money under the new Medicare supplemental premium.

Not true! Most seniors will owe nothing. The average supplemental premium among the 40 percent of seniors who will pay something is less than $300 per year, and less than 10 percent of all seniors will pay the maximum.

Does it make sense for seniors to switch their investments out of taxable securities and into tax exempt bonds? In the overwhelming number of cases, it does not! Especially when one factors in the finance charges of these "advisers."

Following is a good analysis from the March 20, 1989, issue of Forbes. As the headline on the article says:

Should you go into municipal bonds to avoid the new 15 percent Medicare surtax? Probably not, unless you should have been in munis to begin with.

The full article follows:

MEDICARE TAX

(By Ben Weberman)

To judge by the letters that come in from subscribers, a lot of bond salesmen are out there pitching municipals as a way of avoiding the new Medicare surtax. But the case for munis on those grounds is weak. Look closely at the numbers before you buy the argument.

The surtax, which runs as high as $1,600 a year for a couple, is hardly heavy enough to justify a radical change in investing philosophy. In effect, the 15 percent supplement adds about 4 percentage points to the marginal tax rate for someone in the 28 percent bracket. How serious is another 4 percent tax on your return from a bond? Not too serious. On a taxable 9 percent Treasury it docks less than 0.4 percent from your yield. Probably not enough, in short, to make a critical difference in whether the Treasury is a better deal than a municipal.

The surtax arrived via the Medicare Catastrophic Coverge Act of 1988, which increased the premium by an extra $4 a month for catastrophic-illness coverage. According to the American Association of Retired Persons, about 40 percent of Medicare enrollees who pay federal income taxes will be affected by the surtax, which is 15 percent of the regular income tax bill, up to a maximum surtax of $800 per person. The ceiling is reached when an individual's tax passes $5,350 or a couple filing jointly has tax of $10,650 or more.

Remember, the supplement is based on tax, not on taxable income. According to Arthur Andersen, an individual must have taxable income in 1989, after all deductions, of about $27,700 to pay $5,350 in taxes. A couple—both enrolled in Medicare—would have to have taxable income of $52,400 to escape the reach of the surtax. The surtax goes into effect for the 1989 tax year, with tax due in April of 1990.

There is, to be sure, good reason for certain investors to buy municipal bonds. If you're in the 28 percent or 33 percent bracket and are buying long-term bonds, you will get a better yield on a high-grade muni than on a Treasury. The long Treasurys are paying 9.2 percent, or 6.6 percent after federal tax. Good-quality long munis, by contrast, pay 7.5 percent or better.

How does the surtax change the picture? Slightly in favor of the muni. The surtax turns the 28 percent bracket into 32.2 percent. It doesn't do anything to people in the 33 percent bracket, since that bracket begins after the Medicare surtax leaves off. A couple will have to have taxable income above $74,850 in 1989 to be in 33 percent territory. But their surtax obligation is over after they've crossed the $52,400 mark.

How about investors who are afraid of rising interest rates and therefore prefer short-term bonds? In most cases they're better off in Treasurys, whether they are in the 28 percent, 32.2 percent or 33 percent brackets. The three-year Treasury, for example, is paying over 9 percent—even better than the long Treasury—while three-year muni paper is in the 6.4 percent area.

For the longer maturities the advantage to tax-exempts is still there, but smaller than it once was. George Friedlander, managing director of municipal research at Smith Barney, notes that yields on 10-year, 20-year and 30-year tax-frees are low relative to yields on similar maturity Treasurys—lower, recently, than since early 1987. Supplies of munis are curtailed and demand is high. But even at these levels, municipals are attractive in terms of their current aftertax yield.

Once caution is in order, however. If the yields on munis, relative to Treasurys, revert to their historical norms, then the market value of those munis will suffer (again, relative to Treasurys). What we have here is the inescapable fact that a rise in yield creates a fall in market value. In short, don't buy munis if you think they will once again become as plentiful (in relation to demand) as they once were.

State and local bonds that carry a full faith and credit obligation pay 7 percent for the 10-year maturity. That compares with 9.3 percent on 10-year Treasurys, equal to an aftertax return of 6.7 percent for anyone in a 28 percent bracket or 6.2 percent for a 33 percent taxpayer.

At the 20-year maturity range, the general market insured tax-exempt pays 7.7 percent, while the Treasury carries a yield about the same as on a 10-year. This is even more advantageous for the municipal bond investor. But it's also riskier for the muni buyer. If rates on munis do rise a bit relative to Treasurys, the market value loss will be the worst for the longest bonds.

Friedlander says that the benefits of tax-frees are even more apparent for investors in high local tax states, such as New York and California. Historically, this benefit has caused bonds of such states to sell at yields substantially less than those on general market names. Recently, because of supply increases, bonds from high-tax states have been available at rates not much lower than those elsewhere. Indeed, 20-year New York issues now pay the same as 20-year bonds of other states.

In short, munis may or may not be good for you, but whether they are depends more on what maturities you are looking at than on whether you are affected by the Medicare surtax.

NATIONAL DAY OF RECOGNITION OF THE POLISH ARMED FORCES OF WORLD WAR II

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join in supporting House Joint Resolution 147 to designate September 1, 1989, as "National Day of Recognition of the Polish Armed Forces of World War II."

On September 1, 1939, the armed forces of Adolf Hitler's Third Reich overwhelmed the Polish frontier and ignited World War II. Polish soldiers fought valiantly against this onslaught before capitulating. Over 66,000 Polish men and women died. Over 500,000 were taken as prisoners of war. Those who escaped distinguished themselves in numerous battles fought in North Africa and Europe, including battles at Tobruk, the Falaise Gap, and Monte Cassino.

We all owe a debt of gratitude to these courageous Poles. Their sacrifice at the beginning of the war, and their tenacious struggle during the entire war, provided inspiration for the triumphs against fascism which followed.

The recent revelations, now clear even to the Polish Government, of the massacre of Polish officers by Soviet troops during World War II give us further reason to recognize the heroism of the Polish Armed Forces. Just last week the Polish Government finally admitted it was Stalin's army that in 1941 massacred thousands of Polish officers being held in prison camps inside Poland. The Polish people have known this for years. Solidarity erected a monument to those killed in the Katyn Forest. The monument was removed by the Government in 1981. The Soviet Union, to this day, asserts against all evidence that the Nazis were responsible for the massacre.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is in tribute to those valiant defenders. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this bill and call upon my colleagues and all Americans to join me in recognizing the valor and sacrifice of the Polish Armed Forces of World War II.

DAVID A. LINDEMAN HONORED

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, in recognition of the Sixth Annual Awards Dinner of the Over-Sixty Health Center in Berkeley, CA, held February 11, 1989, I would like to memorialize the center's tradition of honoring those who have contributed to the health and welfare of older people.

The outstanding services award is given to David A. Lindeman, D.S.W., director of the Northern California Alzheimer's Disease Center and a senior analyst at the Institute for Health and Aging, University of California, San Francisco. Dr. Lindeman received his D.S.W. in gerontology, health planning, and research methods from the University of California, Berkeley, in 1987. He is a recipient of a number of fellowships among them the Pew doctoral fellow; Regents Fellow University of California, Berkeley; and the Jake Pilter Award. Aside from various memberships in different associations Dr. Lindeman has authored and coauthored over 20 publications on Alzheimer's disease and related dementia, and health planning and long-term care for the aging.

In honor of the late John George, member of the board of supervisors, Alameda County, CA, who worked diligently with the senior community on vital issues affecting the aged, the John George Community Service Awards is bestowed on Rose L. Burrus, community activist, advocate for long-term community care and who worked closely with Supervisor John George to develop the Alameda County Mental Health Advisory Commission; Helene London, one of the founding members of the Over-Sixty Health Center and advocate for elderly programs; and Isabel Van Frank, honorary member of the board of directors in Alameda County, one of the cofounders of the Alameda County Ombudsman Program and the Over-Sixty Health Center and a long time advocate for the poor and disenfranchised.

NATIONAL RURAL HEALTH CARE ACT (H.R. 950)

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, for far too long, this Nation has taken a piecemeal approach to meeting America's rural health care needs. As more and more reports come in detailing the growing problems with America's rural health care system, Congress must move quickly to develop a coherent and comprehensive Federal policy such as that detailed in our National Rural Health Care Act. The time has come for Federal, State, and local governments and the private sector to join forces to both develop and fund an American rural health care system.

That is why I and my colleagues introduced the National Rural Health Care Act on February 9, 1989. Joining me in introducing the bill were Representatives IKE SKELTON, WALTER JONES, ROBERT GARCIA, CHARLES WILSON, WALTER FAUNTROY, JOHN LEWIS, ROBERT KASTENMEIER, CLAUDE HARRIS, ROBERT ROE, MERVYN DYMALLY, CARL C. PERKINS, CHARLES RANGEL, NICK JOE RAHALL, GREG LAUGHLIN, JIM JONTZ, ROBIN TALLON, MATTHEW MARTINEZ, VIC FAZIO, STEVE GUNDERSON, MARTIN LANCASTER, CHARLES HATCHER, HARLEY STAGGERS, E DE LA GARZA, THOMAS FOGLIETTA, ROBERT MRAZEK, BILL RICHARDSON, CHARLES RANGEL, and BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL.

For several years, the committee and its task force on the rural elderly headed by Representatives MIKE SYNAR AND TOM TAUKE have focused attention on the special problems facing poorer and older rural Americans and have been deeply concerned over the state of America's rural health care system. That examination, coupled with a hearing by the committee and its task force on the rural elderly in 1987, convinced us that rural communities, as is the case in our central cities, are in desperate need of assistance when it comes to health care. Many communities experience great difficulty recruiting health professionals. Many rural hospitals are closing or are in jeopardy of closing. Many needed health services—including disease prevention, mental health care, skilled nursing home care, home health care—are often not available in rural areas.

Providing health care to rural Americans has been a difficult problem throughout history. This problem results from a combination of factors: longer travel distances, insufficient numbers of quality health care providers, lower incomes in general, higher rates of being uninsured, and higher proportions of the elderly and poor. In recent years, most policymakers have come to agree that the problems of health care in rural America are substantial and appear to be growing.

Given the problems facing Medicare and Medicaid beneficiaries living in rural America, there is an urgent need to strengthen the rural health care system so that beneficiaries can fully access the benefits of these two programs. No Medicare or Medicaid beneficiaries should face limited access to critically needed care just because they live in rural America. With all the health care problems facing rural Americans, there is no doubt that we need to quickly develop and finance an American rural health care system. However, this cannot be done in isolation, but must be done in the context of what we have yet to do in urban areas as well.

No longer should we sit by and allow large numbers of Americans to lose access to vital health services. Now is the time, through the introduction of the National Rural Health Care Act, for us to sent a message that the Federal Government will play its rightful role in ensuring health care access in both urban and rural communities.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill description be included in the RECORD.

NATIONAL RURAL HEALTH CARE ACT OF 1989—H.R. 950

TITLE I: MEDICARE PROVISIONS

Sec. 101. Propac study of rural hospital payments

The Prospective Payment Assessment Commission is to conduct a study of what should be "reasonable" hospital costs paid by Medicare. This study should also examine the role of Medicare with respect to charity care for non-Medicare recipients. The study is due on January 1, 1991.

Sec. 102 and 103. Development of medical care access facilities (MedCAF) and uses for underutilized hospital bed capacity Hospital bed transition funds would also apply to the development of MedCAFs and would apply whether the hospital is to be closed as a hospital or the hospital is to be restructured. MedCAFs would be eligible for an additional $200,000 development grant to serve as an incentive to either a) transition hospitals or b) create MedCAFs in communities without a hospital, but with documented need. Authorized funding is $30 million for 1990, $40 million for 1991 and $45 million for 1992.

Eligible sites are required to be in 1) a rural medically underserved area (MUA), 2) a frontier service area (less than 6 persons per square mile; distant (more than one-half hour travel time) from city of 5,000 or more; minimum of 500 square miles) or 3) a small rural county (less than 20,000).

MedCAF is a facility which provides ambulatory primary, emergency, urgent, and surgical care, provides basic inpatient care with up to 10 inpatient beds and provide ancilary services including radiology and laboratory) in frontier areas with populations between 1,000 and 5,000. The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services may waive the minimum and maximum populations qualifying for MedCAF designation when the geographic area is similar in character to the MedCAF areas defined above. The maximum number of days allowed per hospital stay is 2 days (48 hours) with an exception process, through the Peer Review Organizations (PRO), for allowing additional days. Each MedCAF is required to have an approved quality assurance plan. MedCAFs are required to accept both Medicare and Medicaid patients.

Reimbursement for hospital care in a MedCAF will be by DRGs tied to a cost-of-doing business index (e.g., index should take into account higher overhead costs and/or stand-by capability). Reimbursement for care provided in the inpatient setting by a physician assistant and nurse practitioner is covered as long as care is provided under the supervision of a physician.

Standards for the ambulatory care part of the MedCAF are to be determined by the Secretary in consultation with appropriate provider and consumer organizations.

Multi-component technicians may be used to staff the emergency room, conduct basic laboratory tests and take basic x-rays. Standards for multi-competent technicians would include the qualifications for an Emergency Medical Technician plus the demonstration of competency based upon on-the-job-training, an approved training program or a mix of both.

Reimbursement for emergency visits will be by combination of fee-for-service (determined on the basis of a relative value scale) for the care by a physician, physician assistant or nurse practitioner and cost-based for facility. Reimbursement for primary care will be by fee-for-service determined on the basis of a relative value scale. Reimbursement for care provided in the ambulatory setting by a physician assistant and nurse practitioner is covered as long as care is provided under the supervision of a physician as per an individual State's practice act.

Sec. 104. Rural Health Clinic Program

Existing Rural Health Clinic Program.—Under the current rural health clinic program, changes are made to lower the physician productivity standard to 2.6 visits per hour and to lower physician assistant and nurse practitioner productivity standard to 1.3 visits per hour. Rural health clinics are eligible for rural health assistance scholarship recipient placements and loan forgiveness if they meet the standards for placements and loan forgiveness. In addition, they are required to accept both Medicare and Medicaid patients. Effective date is January 1, 1990.

Rural Health Clinic Demonstration Program.—In addition to the current rural health clinic program, there is a new, optional demonstration program for which existing rural health clinics may also qualify as of January 1, 1990. The demonstration program follows the same rules as the current rural health clinic program with the following exceptions:

Clinics are paid on a prospectively set, relative value fee schedule for primary care procedures only. The fee schedule is tied to a cost-of-doing-business index (e.g., index should take into account higher overhead costs, 24-hour coverage, stand-by capability).

Additional services are covered including "early detection" procedures, services by nurse practitioners and physician assistants, health education and health risk reduction services.

Clinics are eligible for rural health assistance scholarship recipient placements and loan forgiveness if they meet standards for placements and loan forgiveness.

Clinics are required to have a minimum of 40% of clinic time covered by physician assistants or nurse practitioners, certified nurse midwives or clinical nurse specialists. This minimum may be waived, subject to annual review by the Secretary, if the clinic demonstrates to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the clinic has been unable, despite diligent efforts, to recruit the above practitioners.

The physician productivity standard is lowered to 2.6 visits per hour and the physician assistant and nurse practitioner productivity standard is lowered to 1.3 visits per hour. The Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services has the authority to lower productivity standards in areas of low population density.

Clinics are eligible for start-up Medical Practice Development Grants.

Sec. 105. Rural Medical Practice Payment (effective January 1, 1991)

In setting payment rates for rural medical practices, the rates are to utilize a cost-of-doing-business adjustment (incorporating differences in physician cost, nurse cost, utilities, equipment and supplies, capital costs) in each payment category. Also, provide a separate adjustment on a per payment basis for providing the capability (24-hour on-call coverage and "down-time" in low volume areas).

Additional changes in payments for rural medical practices include: (a) paying at the same rate for the same type of urgent/emergency visits provided at either the hospital emergency room or a physician's office while allowing hospitals to bill for the overhead costs they can currently; and (b) paying for an after-office-hours phone call for the purpose of triaging patients.

Sec. 106 and 107. Rural Nursing Home and Home Health Payment (effective January 1, 1991)

Rural nursing homes are given the option to be paid on a prospectively set "daily rate" schedule, designed by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, in consultation with nursing homes and consumers, which varies by type of patient and is tied to a cost-of-doing-business index (e.g., index should take into account higher overhead costs and/or stand-by capability).

Sec. 108. Rural Health Care Research and Demonstrations (effective October 1, 1990)

The Health Care Financing Administration is directed to increase research into how the Medicare and Medicaid programs could be changed to better cover care for rural residents.

Sec. 109. Nurse Reimbursement incentives

(See later section.)

TITLE II: MEDICAID PROVISIONS

Sec. 201. Medicaid eligibility at 100% of Federal poverty level

In order to ensure improved and uniform access by lower income rural and urban residents, Medicaid eligibility is changed to cover all people whose incomes are at or below 100 percent of the federal poverty level. (Effective January 1, 1991)

Sec. 202. Medicaid rural payments (effective January 1, 1991)

Rural Medical Practice Payment Rates (Effective January 1, 1991).—When States set payment rates for rural medical practice payment rates, the rates utilize a cost-of-doing-business adjustment (incorporating differences in physician cost, nurse cost, utilities, equipment and supplies, capital costs) in each payment category. Also, provide a separate adjustment on a per payment basis for providing 24-hour on-call coverage and "down-time" in low volume areas. In general, the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services is to develop an appropriate system and to provide a reasonable incentive to practice in rural areas.

Additional changes in payments for rural medical practices include: (a) paying at the same rate for the same type of urgent/emergency visits provided at either the hospital emergency room or a physician's office while allowing hospitals to bill for overhead costs they can concur; and (b) paying for an after-office-hours phone call for the purpose of triaging patients.

Rural Nursing Home and Home Health Payment Rates (Effective January 1, 1991).—Rural nursing homes are given the option to be paid on a prospective set "daily rate" schedule, designed by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services in consultation with States, nursing homes and consumers, which varies by type of patient and is tied to a cost-of-doing business index (e.g., index should take into account higher overhead costs, stand-by capability).

Sec. 203. Payment for medical care access facilities (MedCAF)

MedCAFs can be covered by Medicaid as under Medicare. (Effective January 1, 1991)

Sec. 204. Direct nurse reimbursement

(See later section.)

TITLE III: PRIVATE HEALTH INSURANCE PROVISIONS

Sec. 301. Deductibility of private health insurance (effective after December 31, 1990)

Health insurance for self-employed individuals, small businesses and farms is fully deductible under the same rules as for larger businesses.

Sec. 302. Health insurance pool

Within 18 months, the Secretary of Health and Human Services, in consultation with insurers, small businesses, farmers, and consumers, is to develop a proposal for creating a self-financing insurance pool for individuals and small businesses and farms which have difficulty finding affordable private insurance.

TITLE IV: HEALTH CARE SYSTEM DEVELOPMENT PROVISIONS

Sec. 401. Office of Rural Health Care

The Office of Rural Health Care is to be located in the Office of the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

Sec. 402. State Rural Health Block Grants

State Rural Health Planning Grants.—Health planning grants are to be made available to States in order to develop rural health access plants. The formula for distributing available funds among the States is tied to ratio of non-MSA population in a State to non-MSA population in the U.S. population. The minimum for a grant is $100,000. Authorized funding is $20 million for 1990, $21 million for 1991 and $22 million for 1992.

Emergency Medical Services.—A separate rural Emergency Medical Services (EMS) block grant is established. In order to receive funding under the rural EMS block grant, the State is required to have an acceptable state rural health plan. Funding is available for start-up costs for transportation and communications and ongoing costs for uncompensated trauma care and transportation. The formula for distributing available funds among the States is tied to ratio of non-MSA population in a State to non-MSA population in the U.S. population. The minimum for a grant is $1,000,000. Authorized funding is $150 million for 1990, $156 million for 1991 and $160 million for 1992.

Sec. 403. Medical Practice Development Grants

Medical Practice Development Grants for solo and group practices, rural health clinics and MedCAFs are to be made available to increase health care providers serving underserved rural areas.

Medical Practice Development Grants—Solo and Small Group Practices and Rural Health Clinics.—Rural Medical Practice Development Grants are to be available for solo and small group practices. These grants (for training, supplies and equipment) are for practices which increase access to primary care and provide 24-hour urgent care. Grantees are required to accept Medicare and Medicaid patients. For solo and small group practices, start-up grants are up to $20,000 coupled with annual grants of $1000 and the total authorization is $6 million for 1990, $7 million for 1991; $5 million for 1992). For Rural Health Clinics, authorized funding is $20 million for 1990, $30 million for 1991 and $30 million for 1992 and start-up grants are available as follows:

Frontier areas: These areas are eligible for start-up grants of up to $120,000 for operations (maximum of 25% of grant), training, supplies, equipment and facility. A 25% match is required from the local area or the State. Also, clinics are eligible for annual non-matching grants of $1000. Eligible sites are required to be in a frontier service area (less than 6 persons per square mile; distant (more than one-half hour travel time) from a city of 2,500.

Rural counties (non-frontier): These areas are eligible for start-up grants of up to $120,000 for operations (maximum of 25% of grant), training, supplies, equipment and facility. A 75% match is required from the local area or the State. Also, clinics are eligible for annual non-matching grants of $1000. Eligible sites are required to be in a small rural county (less than 20,000).

Medically Underserved Areas (MUA): These areas are eligible for start-up grants of up to $120,000 for clinic operations (maximum of 25% of grant), training, supplies, equipment and facility. A 25% match is required from the local area or the State. Also, these clinics are eligible for annual non-matching grants of $1000.

Sec. 404. Community and Migrant Health Centers.

Community health center and migrant health center funding authorization is increased by 10 percent each.

Sec. 405. Rural health research projects

The National Center for Health Services Research is required to commit a minimum of 5 percent of new grant projects (for fiscal years 1990, 1991 and 1992) for research relevant to improving rural delivery systems. In addition, the National Center for Health Statistics is to conduct a study on how to improve the availability of data for determing medically underserved rural areas and for monitoring changed in the health status of rural residents.

TITLE V: HEALTH CARE PERSONNEL DEVELOPMENT PROVISIONS

Sec. 501. National Health Service Corps Scholarships

For the National Health Service Corps (NHSC), the authorized funding for scholarships and loan repayments is $15 million for 1990, $16 million from 1991 and $17 million for 1992.

Sec. 502. Rural and urban health assistance scholarships and loan repayments

Rural and Urban Health Assistance Scholarships and loan repayments are established. A minimum of forty percent of placements (by type of student) are targeted for underserved rural areas. Eligible sites for placements include those sites eligible under the current NHSC program, MedCAFs, rural health clinics and private practices in underserved rural or urban areas. Scholarship students are required to serve one year in an eligible site for every year of full scholarship. Loan repayments are treated the same way as in current loan repayment programs. Eligible students include primary care physicians (with the primary emphasis being on those in family practice), nurses, nurse practitioners, physician assistants, psychologists, clincial social workers, pharmacists, dentists, and other allied health professionals. For the National Health Service Corps, the authorized funding for scholarships and loan repayments is $15 million for 1990, $16 million for 1991 and $17 million for 1992. For the Urban and Rural Health Assistance Scholarships and loan repayments, the authorized funding is $15 million for 1990, $20 million for 1991 and $22 million for 1992.

Sec. 503. Health Professional Training Program

Primary Care Personnel—Effective January 1, 1991, health professional training programs funded by the federal government would be required to provide assurances that training takes into account special practice conditions of rural areas and target efforts toward students who are more likely to locate in underserved rural areas. To encourage the training of health care professionals who are more likely to serve underserved rural areas, development grants are provided to health training programs to develop and support training programs which can best place providers in underserved rural areas. Authorized funding is $10 million for 1990, $12 million for 1991 and $13 million for 1992.

Multi-competent Technicians—New training program funding is established to train multi-competent technicians to serve in underserved rural areas. Demonstration program grants may be made to hospitals, colleges and technical schools to develop model training programs for multi-competent technicians. Multi-competent technicals are technicians skilled by education/experience to perform limited routine laboratory procedures; limited radiography (chests, extremities, and abdomen) as well as cross trained as EMT I and/or II per DOT guidelines. Authorized funding is $1 million for 1990, $2 million for 1991 and $2 million for 1992.

Sec. 504. Area health education centers

Funding of Area Health Education Centers is raised and targeted toward those health professions in short supply. The number of required residencies is reduced to two. Medical schools are required to provide at least a half-time tenured faculty member to serve as the director. Authorized funding is $20 million for 1990, $21 million for 1991 and $22 million for 1992.

Sec. 505. Continuing education for nursing personnel

Continuing education of nursing personnel is increased through a program to bring continuing education (e.g., via satellite transmission) to rural areas.

TITLE VI: MENTAL HEALTH CARE PROVISIONS

Sec. 601. Alcohol, drug abuse and mental health block grant

Effective January 1, 1990, States receiving alcohol, drug abuse and mental health block grants are required to document the mental health needs in rural areas and document State's level of effort with respect to providing mental health services in rural areas.

Sec. 602. NIMH research on rural health service delivery

Funding is provided for research on rural mental health care delivery systems through the National Institute on Mental Health. Authorized funding is $5 million for 1989, $5 million for 1990 and $5 million for 1991.

NURSE REIMBURSEMENT INCENTIVES

Secs. 109 and 204. Nurse reimbursement incentives

Reimbursement.—Provides direct Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement for nurse practitioners, clinical nurse specialists, certified nurse midwives, and certified registered nurse anesthetists beginning as of January 1, 1991.[1]

Services.—Services are defined as those services covered as physician services and within the scope of state nursing practice laws. These services could include services provided in nursing homes, hospitals, patient homes, and ambulatory care settings.

Reimbursement Level.—Direct reimbursement will be by a fee schedule based on relative value scales established by the Secretary. For the purposes of this bill and by January 1, 1991, the Secretary, in consultation with an advisory panel made up of experts and representatives of nurses affected by this Act, is directed to: 1) design a resource-based relative value scale fee schedule; and 2) conduct a study of the relative costs for physician services and for nurse services (as authorized under this Act) with respect to overhead (including rent, staff, billing, and malpractice insurance) and other resources and make recommendations to Congress within 18 months on relative reimbursement levels for services provided by both physicians and nurses (as defined by this Act).

Peer Review of Utilization and Quality.—Expand scope of Peer Review Organizations (PRO) to include the services performed by these nursing specialty groups (nurse practitioners, clinical nurse specialists, certified nurse-midwives and nurse anesthetists). Also, requires PROs, to the maximum extent feasible, to consult with nurses from the specialty nursing groups and to utilize nurses from the respective nursing specialty group when making final determinations of denial decisions with respect to a nurse from that specialty group.

Hotline.—Direct the Secretary, through the Health Care Financing Administration, to set up a hotline to handle difficulties which the specialized nursing groups are having relative to direct reimbursement.

[1] The reimbursement change for certified registered nurse anesthetists is for Medicaid only, since this group is already covered in a similar fashion in Medicare.

ELECTORAL REFORM INITIATIVES

HON. WAYNE OWENS

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I am today fulfilling a promise that I made throughout my reelection campaign to introduce a series of campaign reform initiatives that will restore public confidence in our electoral process. My first proposed reform is a constitutional amendment to lengthen the terms of Congress from 2 to 4 years. It is high time we reexamine our system for electing public officials. Running for office every 2 years has become so outrageously expensive and inordinately time consuming that it threaten our effectiveness as legislators.

The need for electoral reform is clear. Public distrust is high. Voter participation is low. Campaign costs are soaring. Members of Congress are forced to devote more of their time to fundraising and less to public duties and the real business of Congress. This nonstop campaigning has become an appalling waste of taxpayer time and money.

Extending congressional terms to 4 years would cut the total costs of House elections in half. My election to the House cost $750,000 in 1988, five times what it cost 15 years ago. Four-year terms would not only result in reduced campaign expenditures, but they would also allow Members of Congess more time to concentrate on the myriad of complex national and international issues we have been elected to deal with.

The fundamental ideal of public accountability and direct representation would not be lost in this proposed legislation. To preserve responsiveness, elections would be staggered so that half the House would be elected every 2 years. The final component of my bill would be to require a Representative who declares his candidacy for the Senate to vacate his House seat.

We must ensure that the House of Representatives is an effective instrument of Government, working to the advantage of our constituents and our country. Membership in Congress should be an opportunity to focus on public service—not a perpetual effort to ensure our own reelection.

THE NATIVE AMERICAN BURIAL SITE PRESERVATION ACT OF 1989

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducting the Native American Burial Preservation Act of 1989, which would prohibit the excavation of Native American burial sites.

This month's National Geographic exposed a recent event in Kentucky where such a burial site was badly plundered by people seeking historic artifiacts for sale. The State of Kentucky attempted to prosecute the plunderers but since the people were already back in their home State, and since that State had no such law, they could not be extradited to face charges.

My bill makes it illegal for an individual to excavate or remove any remains of a native American or any materials that were buried or deposited with such remains. If a person is found guilty of such an act, he or she would be fined not more than $10,000 for each violation.

Also, States could enact laws exempting certain, specific areas from this Federal law.

This legislation applies not only to American Indian but also to Eskimos, native Hawaiians, and other natives of ancient origin.

I submit, for the RECORD, a copy of my bill, along with a copy of the recent National Geographic article, entitled, "Who Owns Our Past?"

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Native American Burial Site Preservation Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States has articulated a policy to preserve and protect the inherent right of Native Americans to believe, express, and exercise their traditional religions,

(2) in enacting the American Indian Religious Freedom Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 1996), the Congress recognized the importance of sacred sites, including burial sites, to the traditional religions and religious practices of Native Americans,

(3) the United States, in furtherance of its policy to preserve and protect the religious freedoms of Native Americans and the attendant right of Native Americans to engage in traditional religious practices, recognizes the need to protect and preserve the burial grounds and cemeteries of Native Americans, and

(4) vandalism of American Indian burial grounds is extensive and is growing and there is an interstate market in American Indian remains and artifacts.

SEC. 3. PROHIBITION AGAINST EXCAVATION OF NATIVE AMERICAN BURIAL SITES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b), an individual shall not excavate a Native American burial site or remove any of the contents thereof.

(b) EXCAVATIONS IN DESIGNATED AREAS.—A State may permit excavations and removals prohibited under subsection (a) in any area designated by State law and containted in such State.

SEC. 4. CIVIL PENALTIES.

Any individual found guilty of a violation of section 3 shall be fined not more than $10,000 for each such violation. Any contents of a Native American burial site that are removed in violation of section 3 shall become the property of the United States.

SEC. 5. DEFINITION.

For the purposes of this Act, the term "Native American burial site" means the burial site of any American Indian, Eskimo, Aleut, Native Alaskan, Native Hawaiian, or other individual of ancient native origin of a territory or possession of the United States and the descendants of such individuals.

WHO OWNS OUR PAST?

(By Harvey Orden)

The crime scene—a field in western Kentucky—looked for all the world as if a low-flying squadron of bombers had just swooped over on a practice run. More than 450 small craters, each edged by a mound of raw earth, pocked the surface of the unplanted field. But no air raid caused this destruction. It was the work of . . . but how to refer to them? Some call them relic collectors, pothunters, treasure seekers, even "para-archaeologists." Others, less forgiving castigate them as looters, desecrators, even commercial grave robbers.

By whatever designation—and for whatever motives—the ten men who dug into this field in late 1987 disturbed more than bones and Indian relics. They ripped out and crumpled an irreplaceable page of our common heritage—and raised in high relief the growing controversy over the looting, sale, and exhibition of Native American remains and grave goods. The incident has prodded the nation to ask itself the emotionally charged question: "Who owns our past?"

Miles Hart, retired detective sergeant of the Kentucky State Police, recalls:

"We got a report that some relic hunters were looting an old Indian burial ground on a farm in Union County. Headquarters sent me out to check, since any discovery of human remains has to be filed with the state.

"Now, surface collecting is a popular hobby in this area. A lot of folks have relics or arrowheads. People dig 'em up in their gardens and plow 'em up in their fields. Twenty years ago I used to pick up arrowheads myself—with permission—out of that same field. Before Mrs. Slack died and the farm was sold, she talked to me about the history of the property. I'm still interested in Indian culture, but now I carve copies of peace pipes instead of looking for real ones."

When Sergeant Hart drove out to investigate, two men came to talk with him at the farm gate but refused to let him on the site. Returning with a search warrant, he found that a water tank had been rigged with a hose for softening the drought-parched earth. Countless small probe holes punctured the brown topsoil of the 40 acres overlooking the Ohio River near Uniontown, Kentucky.

"The men had told me there weren't any human bones; it was a prehistoric campsite, not a burial ground; they had rights to dig, and I had no business there since it was private land. But looking at all those craters, well . . . I knew amateurs don't destroy whole sites like that. These people were literally mining the place. It had every sign of a commercial operation."

Sergeant Hart did find bones—clearly human—strewn among the craters. "There were jawbones, leg bones, finger bones, human teeth everywhere. We got a cease and desist order until we could figure out which laws had been broken."

The men had paid the landowner $10,000 to lease digging rights between the fall harvest and spring planting. The ten were charged by the state of Kentucky with "desecration of a venerated object"—a statute applied to crimes ranging from toppling tombstones on Halloween to Ku Klux Klan cross burnings—a misdemeanor that was punishable by a maximum fine of $500 and as much as a year in jail. Four of the ten men, however, lived in Illinois or Indiana and couldn't be extradited for a misdemeanor.

Spurred by the event, the Kentucky Legislature in March 1988 unanimously revised the law, making desecration of graves a felony—which would allow extradition in future cases. Another bill narrowly missed passage in Indiana—where grave looters can be prosecuted only for trespassing, a misdemeanor carrying a fine as low as one dollar. But supporters of the bill promise to push for a stronger law this year.

As of this writing the criminal trial of the "Slack Farm Ten" has been delayed. A parallel civil suit filed by the state (seeking return of artifacts taken from the site, costs of documenting the looting and punitive damages for the destruction of an arthaeological resource) was dismissed in August because Kentucky failed to prove jurisdiction.

Some predict the United States Supreme Court may have to resolve the issue of the state's power to regulate archaeological excavations versus landowner's rights (a cherished Kentucky principle says a property owner's rights go "from heaven to hell").

"If the diggers are found guilty in the criminal case," points out David Wolf, forensic anthropologist of the Kentucky medical examiner's office, "the provisions of ARPA (the federal Archaeological Resources Protection Act of 1979), which only apply on private property if local law has been violated, would kick in. Then the FBI could go in and seize artifacts that has been illegally taken across state lines.

"Because of the scale of the Slack Farm operation and the digger's brazen disregard for human sensibilities, we're hoping this case will spur a national burial preservation act," concludes Dr. Wolf.

Pleading not guilty, the ten defendants are backed by an influential lobby of relic collectors who see a cherished hobby (and profitable business) threatened by proposed laws and new legal precedents. Art Gerber, organizer of an annual Indian relic show in Kentucky, argues in their defense: "These guys are being made the scapegoats for what others have done for years. If it weren't for collectors, a lot of this stuff would be totally lost—plowed into pieces by farmers, washed away by floods, paved over for parking lots and housing projects. We collectors see ourselves as saving history, not destroying it."

Cheryl Ann Munson, senior archaeologist at Indiana University's Glenn A. Black Laboratory of Archaeology, counters: "It's one thing for a collector to pick up points in a field; it is entirely different to dig into archaeological sites to mine artifacts for money. The really sad thing is that we'll never know what's been taken or how it relates to what remains in the ground. Everything has been scrambled. This field is one of the prime Mississippian sites of the Ohio River Valley from the time of European contact. Now much of what we could have known is lost forever."

In February archaeologists, who had been called in by the state medical examiner's office to determine how many of the burials had been disturbed (at least 650, probably more), began mapping the site.

"We had hundreds of volunteers to help with the effort," said archaeologist David Pollack of the Kentucky Heritage Council, which coordinated the operation. "They were local students, businessmen, retired folk—everyone outraged by what they saw." After all the publicity some people who had dug up bones in the past turned them in to the medical examiner's office. There was even talk of turning the Slack Farm site into a park.

What do archaeologists know of this Slack Farm site? As far back as 1858, amateur archaeologist Sidney S. Lyon of nearby Jeffersonville, Indiana, donated some Indian relics he had dug up around there to the Smithsonian Institution. A decade later, Lyon—this time officially sponsored by the Smithsonian—conducted a more thorough survey, noting:

"There is a great field for investigation on both sides of the Ohio, near the mouth of the Wabash River. The people of the country have little or no exact information as to the number or location of the mounds. When a field is cleared inclosing a mound, and bones are ploughed up, the fact becomes known, but the existence of mounds in the woods or on the ridges is almost unknown; and as they are undoubtedly very numerous an explorer would find work enough to do."

Among the five mound groups mapped by Lyon was a concentration of more than 40 mounds at Slack Farm. Some he dug as best he could—with the rudimentary archaeological techniques of the time—and dutifully sent findings to the Smithsonian Institution. His report on this material helped provide clues on the dating and nature of ancient human occupation here—and possibly led the looters of 1987 to the site.

"This was no temporary camp without burials, as the looters claimed," notes Cheryl Ann Munson, one of the archaeologists directing last spring's investigation. "It was a major village that flourished from about A.D. 1450 to 1650. Its people belonged to the Caborn-Welborn phase of the late Mississippian period—an important protohistoric era spanning the time of first contact with Europeans. Pre-Mississippian settlements here include a much older Woodland phase—we call it Crab Orchard—that dates back to about the time of Christ."

At the height of the Mississippian period (A.D. 900 to 1400) towns and villages with flat-topped mounds serving as foundations for nobles' dwellings or temples, covered much of eastern North America. Archaeologists characterize the culture of the Mississippian people as one based on the cultivation of corn. Hence the location in rich river bottomlands of its greatest settlements: Cahokia Mounds in Illinois, near East St. Louis; Angel Mounds, near Evansville, Indiana, just 22 miles upriver from Slack Farm; and Moundville, near Tuscaloosa, Alabama.

The Slack Farm site likely drew importance from the confluence of two great rivers—the Ohio and the Wabash. In the late Mississippian, say A.D. 1500, it would have presented a scene of closely packed rectangular houses of wattle and daub construction, with peaked thatch roofs to handle the mid-western rains; extensive cornfields on alluvial bottomlands; and perhaps 300 to 500 people.

When they died, they were buried in cemeteries near their houses and granaries, with grave goods perhaps to assist them in the spirit world.

By drawing on data from other contemporary sites as well as analogies from the ways of the Choctaw, Creek, Shawnee, and other historical tribes, one can visualize many vignettes of Mississippian life: Men in river clearings burning great logs felled with stone axes, then hollowing them with adzes to make dugout canoes; others along the shore fishing with weighted nets; small hunting groups in the forested higher terrain away from the river, hunting white-tailed deer; children shaping play pots while their mothers built real ones; dogs yapping and cavorting; men and women making flint tools, weaving, repairing houses, carving stone pipes. And pervading the ancient settlement at Slack Farm as thoroughly as the acrid woodsmoke from the cooking fires, a deeply rooted belief system links the visible world to a supernatural universe.

That belief system still persists in the person of Native American activists who arrived on the scene in Union County after they heard about the Slack Farm looting. Outraged at the desecration, they visited the site with Kentucky authorities and later claimed the skeletal remains under a "friend of the deceased" provision of state law.

Their claim was recognized by David Wolf of the state medical examiner's office—who played a crucial role in bringing the criminal case to prosecution. He agreed to give the Indian activists the bones for ceremonial reburial after criminal evidence had been gathered and the scientific analysis had been completed.

Among the factions of the loosely organized Indian contingent were several Shawnee from Oklahoma, who were convinced their direct ancestors had lived in this area before being driven out in the early 1800s. Others were Cherokee, Sioux, Ojibwa, Apache, even Alaska Athapaskan.

Faced with the Shawnee's contention that the Slack Farm site had been a Shawnee village, the archaeologists contacted tribal officials of the Shawnee in Oklahoma and the Miami in Indiana. Neither group claimed descent or grave goods.

"I do not believe that the modern Shawnee descended from the people buried here," says Cheryl Ann Munson. "Only with an extensive excavation and full-fledged study of the remains can we learn more and answer the descent question."

But Native American activists counter that the archaeologists simply don't want to deal with modern Indians who might interfere with their work and make claims to the grave contents—and to many museum collections, as well.

Experts agree that the Shawnee once lived in this region. Shawneetown, Illinois, is only ten miles from Slack Farm, and this whole tri-state area—where Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois converge—is rich in Shawnee associations. Some historians place the Shawnee farther up the Ohio River during the 1500s and 1600s, arguing that they only passed through here in the late 1700s before they were driven across the Mississippi. The authoritative Archaeology of the Lower Ohio River Valley (1986), by Jon Muller of Southern Illinois University, outlines a case for the Shawnee, among others, being the descendants of the Caborn-Welborn people.

And according to Dr. Helen Tanner, research associate at the Newberry Library in Chicago:

"There are only so many tribes who might be identified with the Caborn-Welborn culture, and the Shawnee, in my opinion, are the most likely. It seems to me that many archaeologists have developed a block in tying together historic tribes and prehistoric cultures; in reality it is all one continuum."

Says Dennis Banks, longtime American Indian Movement leader who came to Union County to lead the Indian contingent: "The archaeologists say nobody knows who the descendants of these people are. They say you can't tell if they were Shawnee because they're 'prehistoric.' That's their word for 'prewhite.' It seems they're saying we Indians can't have any ancestors at all. So that gives them the right to dig them up. If you ask me, they're hardly any better than grave robbers themselves; only difference is they've got a state permit. Well, we're here to tell the world that, Shawnee or not, we are all laying claim to these ancestors.

"What if this were a white cemetery that had been desecrated? Would the archaeologists be bagging the disturbed bones and grave goods to take them for study at museums and universities?

"We're not here for a confrontation. We just want to see that the Ancient Ones get a proper reburial. Those who dug up their bones just don't understand the forces they've let loose."

The Indians set up a tepee and organized a vigil near the site, held tobacco-burning ceremonies every four days, and built a sweat lodge to purify those who came to visit the disturbed graves.

A poignant public Ancestors Day ceremony was celebrated over Memorial Day weekend—possibly to become an annual event. Two weeks earlier the first of three consignments of bones was reburied—without fanfare—by Chiefs Leon Shenandoah and Vincent Johnson of the Six Nations Iroquois Confederacy.*

A large cloud, sliding providentially across the otherwise clear sky, gave welcome relief from the hot afternoon sun as Chief Shenandoah put the cardboard boxes containing the remains of 114 Ancient Ones into holes the archaeologists had left for that purpose. In his native Onondaga language, he intoned a series of prayers.

Later he explained: "I was talking to the disturbed spirits. They can't rest until their bones are completely dust. I asked them not to harm us. I told them we are putting them back so they can start their journey to the other world again. And I prayed that they would forget all this ever happened and not take vengeance on those who dug them up."

At the end of the prayers the dirt that the original diggers had tossed aside so carelessly and that the archaeologists had so meticulously sifted was shoveled back to cover the boxes in their new common grave, well beneath the plow zone. Smoothing the mound, Chief Shenandoah set a lighted lantern beside it.

"To light their way to eternity," he said.

In Owensboro, Kentucky, tables groaning under the weight of tens of thousands of Indian artifacts stretch away through a vest ballroom lit by chandeliers. Billed as "The Indian Relic Show of Relic Shows," this annual event is enough to give terminal depression to anyone who knew the childhood miracle of finding an arrowpoint in the backyard.

Box after box is filled with points—you can get the commonest arrowheads for 50 cents to a few dollars; a finely preserved Palee Indian spearpoint brings $500 or more. A glass case displays exquisite bannerstones—the stone weights used with atlatls, the spear-thrower common before the bow and arrow came into vogue some 1,200 years ago. At one table a couple examine a shell pendant, a gorget dangling from a necklace of fine shell beads: $1,200. "It's got the weeping-eye motif of the Southern Cult," urges the seller.

While most pieces bear no label other than price, some have little museum-style ID tags: "Yankeetown, a.d. 1200" . . . "Hopewell, 200 b.c.-a.d. 200."

"You won't find much of the really good stuff out in the open," one vendor confides. "That's kept in vaults. You gotta be serious before they'll show it to you. And watch out for fakes. Even the experts get fooled."

"Did you dig this piece yourself?" you ask the dealers.

Most shake their heads. "Naw, got it at an estate sale." . . . "Bought it from a guy."

"Where's it from?" you ask.

"Well, this guy said he got it down in Georgia." Or Oklahoma. Or bought it from an old lady in Ohio.

Get too specific with your questions, and you get a peeved stare. It's like asking people details of their taxes.

"Anything from Slack Farm here?" That one brings either a blank look or a guffaw. Everyone at the show knows about the recent hoopla. Many items might be from the site—but there's not a whit of legal proof that any of them are.

Photographer Steve Wall managed to track down one piece allegedly from the Slack Farm dig: a four-inch carved limestone pipe (page 385). The collector knows of only two others, one also said to be from the farm and the other from a few miles away. The man who claimed he'd bought it—for $4,500—said he had confirmation of its origin from the seller. Other rare pieces have gone for hundreds of thousands of dollars. Most diggers, though, would tell you they're lucky to make the equivalent of mimimum wage for their hours of shoveling in the hot sun.

"For the vast majority it's the sport and adventrue of it, not the financial gain," says Art Gerber, whose show is one of scores held throughout the country each year. Yet some dealers—including Gerber himself—have collections in their vaults that would make a museum curator cry with frustration. Most of these pieces are what archaeologists call "without provenance"—no record of the physical content from which they were dug. Hence, they are nearly useless for the interpretation of history. Literally, pieces lifted from the puzzle of our common past, never to be fitted.

"Watch out for copperheads!" warned Ed Hastings as he led the way up the hillock behind Slack Farm. Ed has been roaming these bluffs and terraces above the lower Ohio for more than half a century. He was a "surface hunter," making his finds on the ground, not under it. In recent years he's given up even that, becoming purely a mapper of Indian cemeteries and sites. "I've recorded more than 250 sites, some larger, some smaller than this one, all within a hundred miles of here. I guess there must be twice that many. Every so often someone will come across an old Paleo-Indian point out here dropped by a hunter maybe 10,000 years ago. Some of these ancient settlements are layered like wedding cakes, going down maybe a dozen feet.

"When those diggers dug here, they mixed up all the layers and tossed the bones around like to much sewer pipe. No respect for the dead. I've found quite a few bones, too, in my time. Once I found the whole skeleton of a mastodon. But whenever I found human bones, I reburied them with a prayer. Maybe it's because I've got a drop of Apache blood. That was the only time I dug—to put 'em back.

"The diggers say they weren't digging for bones, just pots. But look at all those probe holes among the craters—thousands of 'em. You don't make those looking for pots at random. You'd never find much that way. You make all those probes because you're looking for the soft feel of bones. If you find bones, chances are you're going to find grave goods too. That's where the money is. The only bones they usually take are the whole skulls—people buy 'em as candle holders.

"But I don't see these guys as monsters, like some people do," Hastings continued. "I know the lure. I stopped even surface huntin' because I came to realize it was wrong to take this stuff for yourself. This is everybody's history, not just yours or mine. It shouldn't be for personal profit. I'm not tellin' others to stop surface huntin' or collectin'. But I do say this:

"Don't dig—you destroy history when you do. And don't buy the stuff either. If everybody stopped buyin', these guys would do a lot less destruction. Me, I still hunt for sites but only with my eyes. Those bones down there—they're everyone's ancestors. I say let 'em rest in peace!".

CULTURAL TREASURE: PRIVATE OR PUBLIC DOMAIN?

The excavation and study of archaeological sites in the eastern United States have revealed much about the Archaic, Woodland, and Mississippian periods.

Thousands of sites from millennia of occupations dot the terraces overlooking the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers—prime locations that offered good transportation, excellent hunting and fishing, and rich alluvial soil for growing corn.

Undisturbed strata at the Slack Farm site show major occupations from about 200 B.C. to about A.D. 1650. The last settlement—probably flourishing when Columbus made his New World landfall—belonged to the Caborn-Welborn phase (about 1450-1650) of the late Mississippian period. Only a handful of Caborn-Welborn village sites are known—all have been damaged by looters.

The Slack Farm looting and other incidents across the nation may lead to new legislation in many states—perhaps even a federal law—to safeguard burial sites located on private land, raising a series of yet to be resolved legal questions:

Can a landowner give or sell digging rights to relic hunters? And who should have a say in regulating the digging of burial sites: The landowner? The state? The federal government? The archaeologists and museum curators? The descendants of those whose bones and grave goods they are—specific Indian tribes or all Indians? All Americans who claim the history of their land as part of their national legacy?

Among the few intact artifacts recovered by archaeologists at Slack Farm, two burial pots show the characteristic shape and handles of the Caborn-Welborn culture. Also overlooked by the looters was a fragment of a tiny pot, perhaps made by a child while the mother was firing larger bowls and pots; in a hauntingly human touch, the child's centuries-old fingerprint can still be seen inside the bowl.

Whatever else may have been pirated away from the site will be all but useless for archaeology. Even if an artifact ends up on a dealer's table or in a private collection—like this red catlinite pipe, allegedly from Slack Farm—it will remain forever out of context, a displaced piece of the puzzle of our cultural heritage.

U.N. HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION CONDEMNATION OF ROMANIA

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the U.N. Human Rights Commission meeting in Geneva passed a landmark resolution condemning Romania's human rights practices and calling for a special rapporteur to investigate conditions in that country and report to the Commission in 1 year's time.

The resolutions comes at a time when Romanian activists and the population as a whole are under tremendous pressure from authorities. Doina Cornea, a courageous and eloquent human rights defender in Cluj, remains under virtual house arrest. Over a dozen journalists in Bucharest—including Petre Mihai Bacanu, Anton Uncu, and Mihai Creanga—have been arrested on suspicion of publishing an independent manifesto. Their whereabouts and condition are unknown. Religious believers and minority group members struggle to maintain the integrity of the institutions that serve their special needs. Urban and rural dwellers are threatened equally by Romanian President Ceausescu's program of sistematizare, or sistematization, which calls for the destruction of entire villages and city neighborhoods and for the forcible relocation of inhabitants. Refugees continue to flee repression in Romania, streaming into Hungary and Yugoslavia.

The Romanian delegation to the Commission predictably and immediately announced that the Romanian Government would not comply with the resolution's mandate for an envoy appointed by the Commission to visit Romania. Less than 2 months ago the Romanian Government reacted in a similarly cynical fashion to the concluding document of the Vienna review meeting of the conference on security and cooperation in Europe, proclaiming that it would comply only selectively with that document's provisions.

Whether or not the Romanian Government allows a U.N. investigator to enter the country, the Human Rights Commission's resolution represents a significant and timely advance in the growing international campaign to call attention to the unacceptable human rights conditions in Romania. Only 7 countries came to Romania's defense by voting against the resolution, as against 21—including the United States—that supported it, 10 that abstained, and 5 that did not participate. The Soviet Union, Ukraine, Bulgaria, and the German Democratic Republic were among the latter group. While they did not join Hungary in condemning Romania's human rights performance, nor did they support the Romanian position.

The message in all this for Romania is that in its growing isolation it cannot hide from the eyes of the world. It will be held accountable for its actions by the community of nations in which it aspires to be a respected member. Whether in the context of the CSCE process or of the United Nations, the Romanian regime is recognized as, and increasingly condemned for being, a flagrant abuser of human rights.

THE DOMESTIC CORPORATION TAXATION EQUALITY ACT OF 1989

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today for myself and Representatives ARCHER, BENTLEY, BROWN of Colorado, CHANDLER, COBLE, GIBBONS, GRADISON, GUARINI, JOHNSON of Connecticut, JENKINS, ROSE, VANDER JAGT, and WOLF the Domestic Corporation Taxation Equality Act of 1989. The bill addresses the problem of double taxation resulting from: First, four States' use of that method of corporate tax assessment called worldwide unitary tax; and second, the taxation by eight States of dividends received by American corporations from income earned by their subsidiaries overseas without giving any credit for foreign taxes on that income.

State governments in the United States have traditionally used a formula to ascertain how much of the income of a single corporation doing business in the United States should be taxed by each. Most often that formula is the amount of the corporation's payroll, sales, and property in the taxing State compared to all States in which it does business. About one-half of the States apply this "unitary tax method" to multicompany groups operating in more than one State. "Worldwide unitary taxation" carries the application of the unitary tax method one step further to include overseas affiliated corporations.

The use of worldwide unitary taxation necessarily results in international double taxation; once by the host country and again by the State using the method. The application of worldwide unitary taxation to the overseas subsidiaries or affiliates of U.S. corporations also results in over taxation of income because of noncomparable costs of United States and overseas apportionment factors such as property and labor costs.

The double taxation which occurs when a few States tax intercorporate dividends received by American corporations from their overseas affiliates would be remedied by the second section of the bill. The principle is the same, that income was earned outside the United States and the taxing jurisdiction of any State, and is subject to the tax of the country in which it was earned. The four States that use worldwide unitary taxation do not separately tax intercorporate dividends received by American corporations from their overseas subsidiaries because the worldwide combination of the income of the parent and affiliate corporations already includes that income. Without the requirement of the second section of the bill for a tax credit or exemption, those States could again doubly tax such income by separately subjecting it to tax. Hawaii, Iowa, Maine, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Rhode Island, Vermont, and the District of Columbia, separately tax such dividends without allowing any credit or exemption for taxes paid in the country in which that income was earned.

The Federal Government has agreed not to use worldwide unitary taxation in every income tax treaty to which it is a party. In fact, worldwide unitary taxation is not used by any other country in the world or by 41 of the 45 States which tax corporate income. Alaska—but not for oil companies, California, Montana, and North Dakota are the only taxing jurisdictions that use worldwide unitary taxation.

There are those who think the problem has been solved because in the past several years eight States have abandoned the use of worldwide unitary taxation and California, Montana, and North Dakota have modified their use of it. However, the need for a Federal solution remains. All three States, while allowing corporations to elect whether or not to be taxed under worldwide unitary taxation, require the payment of a fee or higher rate of tax for the right to make that election, make the election binding for a number of years, and impose an additional administration burden by demanding that corporations prepare and file detailed information on all worldwide affiliates.

California still doubly taxes U.S. corporations and discriminates against them, because their foreign counterparts are not being taxed the same way—California includes all of the worldwide income of United States 80/20 corporations—those with less than 20 percent of their activities within the United States—in the domestic tax base, while excluding the overseas income of foreign corporations having less than 20 percent of their activities in the United States.

Not only is it patently wrong to doubly tax and discriminate against American companies, it is short sighted in these terms of intense global competition. We have asked our corporations to modernize their facilities, improve efficiency, reduce costs, and develop products to compete in a highly competitive global marketplace. We have negotiated wide ranging free trade agreements and treaties and enacted legislation to ensure a "level playing field" for our corporations, but we have ignored the practices of a few States which detract from the ability of our corporations to compete internationally.

We have lived far too long with the disruption to this country's foreign policy which results from the use by a small minority of States of a method of tax assessment that contradicts the method used by the Federal Government and the rest of the world. The adverse effects upon the ability of the Federal Government to carry out its tax and investment policy in the international arena and to manage the sensitive issue of international double taxation has been described by President Reagan, Secretary of State Shultz, Secretary of the Treasury Baker, and in briefs recently filed by the Department of Justice in pending litigation.

The legislation will not violate States' rights or alter the taxing jurisdiction of the States. It only requires the four States which still utilize worldwide unitary taxation to use the same method for sourcing corporate income that is used by the other 41 of the 45 States which tax corporate income, the Federal Government, and every foreign taxing jurisdiction in the world. It also asks the few States that tax intercompany dividends received the U.S. corporations from their overseas subsidiaries to do so equitably, by recognizing that the income from which those dividends are paid has been taxed overseas. If the legislation is enacted States will remain free to tax all income generated within their borders, at whatever rate they choose. The bill will even permit any State to use worldwide unitary taxation as so long as a reasonable opportunity is allowed the taxpayer to compete its income on a nonworldwide unitary method.

I trust that my colleagues will recognize that the enactment of this legislation is not only needed, but long overdue. If we are to truly make American business more competitive in international markets and require our trading partners to help us ensure a level playing field for such competition, then we must at a minimum see that such requirement is met within our own country.

SOME ADVICE FOR ADMINISTRATION APPOINTEES

HON. DANA ROHRABACHER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Mr. Speaker, the following article appeared in the Washington Times on March 7, 1989.

Although incoming appointees certainly get enough free advice from all quarters, this article merits particular attention; unlike the vast majority of "rules" and "political axioms" eager pundits levy upon the new arrivals, the advice this article contains may be worth a lot more to a new appointee than he or she pays for it.

ADVICE TO INCOMING APPOINTEES

(By Kenneth Tomlinson)

For years you have labored in relative obscurity raising money or contributing to policy for a presidential candidate. Or maybe you once lived across the street from the new president, or the new chief of state was profoundly influenced by that article you did last year for Commentary.

Whatever the reason, your ship has come in. You have been tapped by President George Bush to head a bureau or commission, or even a federal agency.

These are heady times for you—days that may well be the most exciting of your life. But don't forget that for every presidential appointee whose job enriches his or her life or pocketbook, there are examples of reputations ruined by federal service. If history repeats itself, a few of you may even land in jail.

Before I accepted my first job in the Reagan administration, I was lucky enough to be the recipient of advice on managing in government that proved critical to the two great years I spent as director of Voice of America.

For what it's worth, here are the basic rules that enabled me to enjoy the experience.

REMEMBER YOUR GOALS

Before I settled into Washington, a friend and former Carter administration official called with a confession that rather surprised me. "In the eyes of the world I was a success," he explained. "At the end of each day my in-box was empty and my out-box was full. I kept all the balls in the air. But when it was over, I realized I had failed to accomplish the two or three things that I went into government to do."

Each week you are in office, force yourself to remember why it was you wanted the job. And organize yourself so that others handle the busy work of the agency, while you concentrate on accomplishing your goals. Everything from the plague of interminable government meetings to the constant overview of Congress will work to take your eyes off the ball. But as Winston Churchill said, "Never, never, never give in."

If you don't have goals, get some. Call others who have served in the post and seek their advice. Or do the same with political friends.

Remember the words from Proverbs: "Where there is no vision, the people perish." The same is true for federal agencies. Where people are not working toward specific goals, stagnation or mayhem is inevitable.

Once you have your goals, be sure to communicate them to the people in your agency and your colleagues in the administration. Do an op-ed piece for a newspaper or an article for a magazine, setting forth what you want to do.

If you can't talk about your goals in public, then you'd better get some new ones, because hidden agendas and secret plans are out in today's Washington. If you don't believe me, ask Adm. John Poindexter.

GLAD YOU ASKED, JACK

On your first day in the job a seemingly wise administrative-type may explain that there's a way to get the government to cover your moving expenses. Never mind that the law says that presidential appointees must move themselves to Washington. He will explain that as a temporary senior executive service officer, as you await Senate confirmation, it can be arranged for the government to pick up your moving tab.

Don't do it.

During your first weeks, a bureaucrat will come to you with plans to remodel your office or build you a new bathroom or, as was the case at Voice of America, create a plush new hallway leading to your office that would have been crowned the Executive Corridor.

Don't do it.

In giving a party—even for your employees—pay for it yourself, despite the fact that your administrative officer will assure you the tab can easily be absorbed in your budget.

People trying to ingratiate themselves with you—or show you the path to power and influence in Washington—will sorely tempt you with plans and schemes, many of them seemingly innocent in nature.

You will avoid these traps because you will come to your job equipped with the concept that before you make a move in government you'd better ask yourself if you could truthfully respond to a call from columnist Jack Anderson with the words: "Glad you asked that, Jack."

Your honesty will be rewarded—or your dishonesty repaid. Leaks are a form of participatory democracy. Once you are in a federal post, you can count on having no secrets.

CHOOSE YOUR STAFF—CAREFULLY

As soon as you land your job, you'll be hearing from White House personnel with ideas for your deputy or even your executive assistant. You'll get names from people who helped you get your job. You don't want to stonewall the White House or your friends—after all, these are the people who put you where you are—but be wary of letting someone else choose your key staff.

Even in this age of enlightenment, loyalty still is a critical factor in staffing an agency. And chances are that the deputy someone else chooses for you in actuality is going to have his eye on your job.

You will be surprised at how few new people you can hire for your agency—so that makes your selection even more important. Your staff should complement your own capabilities. If you are a politically driven idea person, don't recruit another policy-type as a key adviser, because what you really need is an organizer to get things done.

What about the career types that you will find running the agency when you arrive? Be careful. If you place yourself in their hands, you'll sleep well at night and you'll have a fine time at ribbon-cutting occasions, but chances are you will have little real impact on your agency.

Does this mean you should freeze out career people? Absolutely not. Many former agency heads I know assert that over the long haul, career people are more important in accomplishing goals than your political appointees. But these will be career people who decide to support your program—one hopes because they believe it is best for the health of the agency.

FOLLOW THROUGH

You can communicate your program in the press and on Capitol Hill, but don't assume your subordinates are carrying out your goals—no matter how worthy.

It's human nature. Your goals weren't their ideas.

Indeed, it is no accident that your agency has drifted in a direction that you want to change. There were good bureaucratic reasons why that happened.

When I went to VOA, I thought it would be easy to erase the political conflicts that long had plagued the agency. America doesn't speak with one voice. We speak with a rich diversity of voices, so why not stop warfare between the left and the right by making the VOA reflect the dynamic voices of America.

All this sounded great in confirmation hearings and op-ed articles, and everyone prepared for a new era of peace at VOA.

There was but one problem. Senior managers explained program changes couldn't be done. Even in this era of high-tech broadcasting, engineers argued that interviews by telephone were not good enough for shortwave broadcasting. Not coincidentally, telephone interviews would require far fewer engineers.

Senior broadcast executives said it couldn't be done. They balked at programming changes that would have greatly increased outside participation, using the model of the "MacNeil/Lahrer NewsHour." That would have required more work than the traditional one-guest, one-microphone approach.

Eventually, VOA journalists, both young and old, played integral roles in carrying out the programming reforms senior managers said could not be done. But first, barriers to changes had to be overcome.

How can you ensure that reforms are carried out? There is no substitute for follow-through. By and large, your core staff will have to carry this responsibility. But so must you. A friend tells of discovering the breakdown in the chain to be a key aide who was assuring department managers that the boss would soon become so engulfed in interagency turf wars and budget process that he would forget all about internal reforms. That's why you must constantly remind yourself of your goals. It's also why you must count on spending long hours at your agency—unless your goal is to travel the world in the lap of government luxury.

YOU CAN'T NEED THE JOB

In the early 1960s, when I was a teen-age intern on Capitol Hill, I heard a reporter ask then Montana Rep. James Battin how he could cope with the political pressures of Washington. "Because I really don't need this job," Mr. Battin thundered defiantly," and he spoke with such force that I for one believed him.

The moment you feel that for whatever reasons you need to have your political job is the moment you'd better be running for the exit. This is certainly true if you need the money the job pays. It's also true if you need the trappings of power or prestige that go with a presidential appointment.

Some of the saddest scenes I've ever witnessed are those of presidential appointees trying to hold onto their jobs after having been mortally wounded.

To me this is the unwritten side of virtually every major political scandal of our time. There were people with the sense to stop everything from Watergate to Iran-Contra—but they so needed their job, or so they thought, that they could not say no.

Putting major confrontations aside, how will you know when it is time to go? You'll know, though age (the older you get the less you have to worry about the future) and personal wealth might enable you to ignore the signs.

For me the signal came as I neared the end of my second year. I answered the phone at home one evening and a child asked to speak with Lucas, then five years old. "This is his father," I explained, "I'll get him for you."

On the other end of the line, the child turned to his mother and said, "I didn't know Lucas had a father."

When I heard that I suppose I knew deep in my heart that it was time to return to normalcy. To this day, I regret having had to leave so soon.

ROMANIA'S HUMAN RIGHTS DUE TO BE SUBJECT OF UNITED NATIONS SPECIAL RAPPORTEUR

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday in the closing days of the United Nations Human Rights Commission meeting in Geneva, a Swedish resolution was approved which would authorize the appointment of a special rapporteur to investigate Romania's human rights abuses.

The resolution expresses world-wide "concern at the allegations of serious violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in Romania." In particular, the measure warns of "further violation of the human rights of large sections of the population," if Romania's rural systematization plans are implemented. The resolution also points to the "increasingly severe obstacles for Romania's national minorities to maintain their cultural identity."

Hungary, Romania's next door Warsaw Pact ally, has been quite vocal regarding Romania's systematization plan which includes the complete bulldozing of villages and the destruction of Hungarian artifacts, architecture and traditions, However, this most recent United Nations action and universal expression of concern is unprecedented. Of particular note is the breakdown of the vote; 21 countries voted in favor, 7 against, 10 abstained and 5 did not participate. Among those not participating were the Soviet Union, East Germany Ukraine—Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic—and Bulgaria. Hungary joined the United States and other Western nations in support of the special rapporteur. While not a voting member of the Human Rights Commission, Hungary cosponsored the resolution introduced by Sweden.

Dictator Ceausescu's outrageous and inhuman systematization plans are underway and families are losing their homes, churches, communities and livestock. The European Community and Council of Europe have initiated an innovative humanitarian effort to help the peoples of Romania facing destruction of their towns and villages. "Operation Romanian Villages" is seeking Western European communities—hopefully 13,000 communities—to adopt rural villages of Romania. Approximately 8,000 villages—the specific towns targeted have not been publicized—are slated for destruction eventually.

Mr. Speaker, several of my colleagues and I who have been leading the debate in Congress regarding Romania's treatment of its people recently sent a telegram to the United States representative to the Commission, Ambassador Armando Valladares. We urged the Ambassador to support the appointment of a special rapporteur in hopes that such an investigation will help improve the living conditions of the people of Romania. Mr. Speaker, over the last several years in my discussions with Romanian officials, the Ambassador of Romania, in particular, I have repeatedly asked that human rights observers be allowed into the country but such appeals have been consistently denied.

I am hopeful that the United Nations Rapporteur will be permitted to observe all aspects of human rights in Romania—the effects of systematization, the denial of religious freedom, and the right to free assembly. Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the Rapporteur's report which will be due at the 46th session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission in 1990.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO WKER RADIO, POMPTON LAKES, NJ, ON 25 YEARS OF SERVICE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, I have always believed that effective communications among all segments of our society is the foundation of our well-being and critical in the effort to maintain peace in the world. In this regard, it is with great pride that I rise today to salute a local radio station in my Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey which, for a quarter of a century, has provided a vital communication link to the people of the greater northern New Jersey area.

I am speaking of radio station WKER of Pompton Lakes, NJ; its visionary founder, the late Bob Kerr, and two people who have helped guide the station since its founding and whose tireless efforts have made WKER a critical asset and resource to the community, Lee Novak and Tom Niven. In honor of WKER's long and dedicated service to the people of northern New Jersey, the Pompton Lakes Chamber of Commerce will pay special tribute to this outstanding institution when it holds its annual installation of officers and distinguished service awards dinner dance on March 18, 1989, at the Regency House in Pompton Plains.

Mr. Speaker, I know that Lee Novak and Tom Niven, who have been instrumental in making WKER what it is today, will accept this honor being bestowed on their radio station with great pride. I know, too, they will be thinking of their late colleague, Bob Kerr, and the profound impact his initial efforts have made on his community.

WKER Radio was the dream of Bob Kerr, then a resident of West Milford, NJ, who had the foresight and vision to recognize that the people of northern New Jersey needed their own special source for local news and a catalyst that would help bring the area together as one community. Bob Kerr's dream was realized on October 4, 1964, when WKER went on the air. Since that time, under Bob Kerr's vision and Lee Novak's and Tom Niven's guidance, WKER has made a priceless contribution to the people of the 43 communities in its listening area, having focused its efforts on community concerns and serving as an immediate daily source for local news.

Mr. Speaker, along with providing the citizens of its listening area with news they could hear no where else, WKER has gone above and beyond the call of duty in its service to the community. Located in a flood-prone area, WKER has often been the sole communication link between civil defense authorities and the public, relaying flood emergency information to the affected area residents and remaining on the air when the station itself was flooded through the outstanding efforts of dedicated employees until the emergency had passed.

Regrettably, Bob Kerr passed on in 1982. But the fruits of his efforts live on through the tireless dedication of Lee Novak and Tom Niven, who oversee all aspects of WKER's operation and who have followed in his spirit of contributing to the community with the best in news and musical entertainment, participation in local organizations and the chamber of commerce, maintaining free access to WKER for local civic, religious and fraternal organizations, and affording the business community an effective lifeline to a vast audience.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the late Bob Kerr would indeed be proud to see how the tradition of his original vision has lived on and flourished under the guidance of his devoted colleagues, enriching the lives of the people of the northern New Jersey area just the way he intended. It is with great pride, then, that I ask you and our colleagues to join me in paying tribute to radio station WKER of Pompton Lakes, a vital communication link in northern New Jersey, and the true American pioneers responsible for its success, the late Bob Kerr and Lee Novak and Tom Niven, who have truly made their community, State and Nation a better place to live.

NATIONAL JOB SKILLS WEEK

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a resolution designating the week of October 8, 1989 through October 14, 1989 as "National Job Skills Week." I am happy to note that for the fourth straight year, Senator GORE is introducing identical legislation in the Senate.

The point of this resolution is straight forward and bipartisan. Economic competition among nations is increasing, and for America to meet this challenge, its work force must become more highly skilled. Republicans and Democrats agree that to keep our Nation competitive, our businesses need workers who have strong literacy and math training.

Labor Secretary, Elizabeth Dole, says we are becoming a society where jobs increasingly go to only those workers with the skills required by the new, highly competitive, information based economy. She says "many of (today's) workers don't have the basic skills they need to function in the jobs available now, much less the jobs of the future."

This "skills gap," she says, already costs businesses "billions of dollars in lost productivity, absenteeism, poor product quality, and lost time." But even more importantly, Secretary Dole urges that "we must act now if we are to avoid the haunting possibility of a permanent underclass of 'unemployables,' concentrated in poor, inner city neighborhoods afflicted by drugs and crime, and isolated from the Nation's economic and social mainstream."

I agree wholeheartedly with those comments by Secretary Dole. We need only look around us to see that a head-on collision is coming. Computer use increases, while America's reading skills decrease. Robotics use increases, while America's math skills decrease. Nine million Americans go unemployed, while business begs for highly skilled workers. Clearly, if we are to remain competitive as a nation, then we must have a work force that is competitive.

"National Job Skills Week" focuses attention on the need for a skilled work force, as well as efforts by business and government to provide it. For without a foundation of basic skills, there is no hope of effectively using the technology of today and tomorrow. I urge each of my colleagues to join with me in passing this resolution for the fourth year in a row.

NATIONAL HOSPICE MONTH

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate the month of November in 1989 and 1990 as "National Hospice Month." I am delighted that the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee is joining me once again in sponsoring this resolution. Similar resolutions, which I introduced each year beginning in 1984, received strong bipartisan support and were enacted.

Hospice—an innovative, comprehensive, compassionate approach to caring for terminally ill persons as well as their families—has become a respected, viable partner in the Nation's health care system. Hospice care is now a permanent benefit under the Medicare Program and an option under the Medicaid Program.

Each year, thousands of families face the crisis of caring for a family member with a terminal illness. Hospice provides a unique program of support and care, allowing patients to remain in the familiar surroundings of their own homes or in homelike inpatient facilities. The delivery of services by a team of physicians, nurses, social workers, therapists, clergy, and hospice-trained volunteers concentrates on enabling patients to live as meaningfully and as comfortable as possible until their death. Today, there are about 1,700 hospice programs across the country.

This humanitarian method of care has proven to be an excellent way for patients and their families to cope with the stress and emotion of a terminal illness. While awareness of and support for the hospice concept has grown dramatically over the last few years, there remains a need for public education regarding the benefits of hospice care. It is also appropriate that we recognize the significant contributions made by those involved in the provision of hospice services and in the advancement of the hospice philosophy.

The public education and recognition programs conducted during National Hospice Month will continue to expand the knowledge of and support for hospice care.

I am very pleased that a similar resolution is being introduced today in the other body by Senator LLOYD BENTSEN.

IRVING KESSLER LAUDED

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I would like to salute Irving Kessler upon his retirement as the executive vice chairman of United Israel Appeal. The United States Congress has since 1975 joined in assisting the resettlement of Jewish refugees in the State of Israel. The United Israel Appeal, a registered private voluntary organization, is responsible for disbursing U.S. funds through the Jewish Agency for Israel. Irving Kessler, as the senior administrator of United Israel Appeal, has guided many of us to a greater understanding of the program, its aims, and accomplishments.

Irving Kessler was raised in Boston and earned degrees in history and government at Tufts University and at Columbia. He served with the U.S. Armed Forces during the Second World War and volunteered his services during the establishment of the Israeli State. He was the assistant director for Israel bonds and, subsequently, director of the Labor Zionist Organization in Boston. He later held positions with the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston and went on to become the assistant director and then the executive director of the Hartford Jewish Federation. In 1974, Irving assumed the position of executive vice chairman of the United Israel Appeal.

In his private life, too, Irving Kessler has followed in that great American tradition of volunteer service. He has served as president of the world Conference of Jewish Communal Services, as an associate member of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel, as chairman of the professional advisory committee to the Hornstein School of Jewish Communal Service at Brandeis University, as a member of the executive committee of the American Council of Volunteer Agencies, and as a trustee of the Association of Jewish Community Organizational Personnel.

Irving Kessler has left a remarkable record at the United Israel Appeal and in the American Jewish community. I believe that his career can be understood best in the words of the early leader of the Zionist movement, Theodore Herzl. It was Herzl who said, "If you will it, it is no dream." Irving Kessler believes that when you put your mind to it, when you add your own heart, sweat, and toil, and when you give your all, one person can make dreams become reality.

On the occasion of his retirement, I wish to applaud Irving Kessler's good work. I wish him well and thank him for the service rendered to the United Israel Appeal and to the American people.

THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA'S TRIO PROGRAMS 1989

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to the District of Columbia's Trio programs developed to provide individualized guidance, counseling, tutoring and cultural enrichment for persons seeking to improve their status in the community.

Since passage of the Higher Education Act of 1965, post-secondary planning for disadvantaged youth and adults has been addressed by federally-funded student support service programs around the country.

In the District of Columbia 6 programs—funded by the U.S. Department of Education—assist approximately 4,000 District residents each year who eventually matriculate into higher education.

Working in cooperation with secondary and post-secondary institutions, community agencies and Government, local Trio programs play an important role in encouraging upward mobility and enhancing educational opportunities for low-income, first-generation students.

The District of Columbia's Trio programs are also an important retention mechanism for physically handicapped students in higher education and provide information about financial and academic assistance to District residents.

As a measure of outstanding success, the Trio programs coordinated by Directors Joseph Bell, Paulette Morgan, Jerry Feliciana, Anita Coleman, and John Reymer recently saluted the achievements of several Trio students.

Included among the students are Brad Mims, legislative director for Congressman JOHN LEWIS; Rhodes Scholar Barbara Harmon-Schamburger; Yolanda Galloway; attorney for Jones, Day, Reavis and Pogue; and Ronald McGowan, accountant for Peat, Marwick and Main.

I share with you the future leaders of America.

RECOGNIZING THE FAMILY COUNSELING SERVICE ON THE OPENING OF ITS NEW MAHWAH, NJ OFFICE

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor and thank an extraordinary organization, the Family Counseling Service, of northern New Jersey. It was founded in 1956 to serve a real and tangible need; that is, helping families cope with emotional crisis. The Family Counseling Service, a United Way of Bergen County affiliate, extends its professional services to the families of my district with offices in Ridgewood and Oakland. Today I would like to pay tribute to the Family Counseling Service on the opening of a new office in Mahwah on March 20.

The mission of the Family Counseling Service is to strengthen the family through a professional and sophisticated program of education and treatment. Its dedicated staff of psychiatrists, clinical social workers, and counseling specialists meet a variety of needs which face families in the wake of depression, substance abuse, divorce, or death. This nonprofit, confidential, and comprehensive approach to healing has answered the prayers of countless families in desperate need.

Mr. Speaker, as Members of Congress, we must follow the example of the Family Counseling Service and support policies which strengthen the family. I would like to commend Robert B. Jones, executive director, Joan K. Wrede, president of the board of trustees, and Douglas Dittrick and Norman F. Nelson, vice presidents, for their leadership and dedication. To them, I extend the good wishes and gratitude of all those whose lives have been touched by the Family Counseling Service.

PROTECT OUR CHILDREN FROM TELEVISION VIOLENCE AND OBSCENITY

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in introducing the Television Violence Act which will address the problems of violence and obscenity on television. This bill will allow the television industry to undertake collective voluntary measures to curb the violence in programming seen by children without being subject to the antitrust laws for a period of 3 years.

As the father of six children, I know how difficult it is to protect our children from corrupt influences in society. Everyone must do their part to see that the next generation of leaders is prepared academically and morally to keep our country powerful and free. Television can be a strong and effective tool to educate our young people, but television industry leaders must meet and implement guidelines to reduce television violence and obscenity.

The Television Violence Act does not dictate the content of television programming, but allows network leaders to meet together to address this important issue. Congress is encouraging the television industry to be accountable for the influence which they exert over the minds of young people. Television programming should be inspiring and enlightening and should avoid the depraved. This bill simply challenges our television leaders and provides them with an opportunity to work together to put quality television within the reach of children.

In the 100th Congress we achieved successful enactment of the Child Protection and Obscenity Enforcement Act, and a number of my colleagues and I have continued action for children by cosponsoring and vehemently supporting the Child Protection Act in the 101st Congress. This legislation will add the sexual exploitation of children as a provision under the Racketeer Influence and Corrupt Organization statute [RICO], and will provide for stronger punishment for persons convicted of sexual exploitation of children.

We should all be dedicated to protecting children and strengthening the moral fiber of our society. Children, not unlike their parents, spend a large part of their leisure time watching television. Adults have the responsibility to see that television has an educational and beneficial influence on children and not a corrupting one. Congress can help the television industry meet this challenge by passing the Television Violence Act.

AMERICA MUST GUARD AGAINST LAND AND WATER CONTAMINATION

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a very serious environmental problem. This problem, however, unlike many which confront us today, is one in which a solution is within our reach—in fact, we have the technology, it is affordable and quite feasible to undertake. The problem to which I refer is contamination of our water supplies.

Each year, billions of gallons of potable water are lost. Last year, for instance, on January 2, hundreds of thousands of residents of communities surrounding Pittsburgh were without water for over 1 week when an oil storage tank at the Ashland Oil facility erupted, spilling over 700,000 gallons of diesel fuel into the Monongahela River. You may also recall the tragedy that occurred in South Dakota when a 1,000 gallon gasoline spill at the Williams Pipe Line Company's facilities reached ground water supplies. That particular incident occurred early in 1987 but underscored the danger such storage tanks can pose as Williams' equipment was responsible for the contamination of either water or soil in the South Dakota area eight times since October 1983.

Mr. Speaker, current regulations require that storage tanks near navigable waters have a secondary means of containment. In most cases, this simply consists of an earthwork dike around the tank. Needless to say, in the event of an emergency, existing secondary systems can prove grossly inadequate, in that they fail to protect the public health and safety. As I stated earlier, we possess the technology to prevent this type of disaster. I am referring to a liner system. Such systems are already required in above ground storage tanks containing hazardous wastes. However, more accidents could be prevented if we were to extend this requirement to apply to secondary containment of oil storage tanks as well. These liners, usually made of polyethylene plastic have proven very effective at permanently eliminating the problem of leakage. These liners actually strengthen storage dikes and have also actually helped in leak detection. Not only can liners prevent contamination of drinking water supplies but they can be used to restore tanks themselves.

Mr. Speaker, protection of the environment and the public's welfare is of the utmost importance. Contamination of our land and our water supplies must be guarded against. I strongly suggest that the Environment Protection Agency examine the potential for a liner requirement that would help to prevent any future tragedies.

THE ARIAS PEACE PLAN: A BROKEN DREAM

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, if recent history has shown us anything, it has shown us that Communist governments break international agreements with appalling regularity. From Yalta to Helsinki to numerous arms agreements, the Soviet Union and its surrogates have shown a remarkable propensity to break agreements.

Nicaragua is a Soviet client state, and Congress should have no illusions regarding Sandinista compliance with the Arias peace plan or any other peace agreement that the current Nicaraguan dictatorship may enter into with its Central American neighbors. Indeed the Sandinistas have already established a track record of broken promises.

In 1979, when they needed the support of the Organization of American States to legitimize their regime, they promised to allow political pluralism, maintain a truly mixed economy, respect human rights, and conduct a nonaligned foreign policy. These promises allowed the Sandinistas the time they needed to consolidate their power in Nicaragua, power that enabled them to break each of the aforementioned promises.

The only force which has proven itself able to pressure the Sandinistas into honoring their promises are the Nicaraguan freedom fighters, commonly referred to as the Contras, who the United States has intermittently supported. The Congress has cut off all of the vital military aid to the Contras, and has, in effect, allowed the Contras to wither on the vine.

Congress is disregarding history at the expense of the freedom of the people of Nicaragua. It is with these thoughts in mind that I respectfully submit the following report for the RECORD.

THE ARIAS PEACE PLAN: A BROKEN DREAM

In February of 1987, Oscar Arias of Costa Rica introduced his now famous Central American Peace Plan; it was signed six months later by the leaders of all five Central American countries. Although the plan addressed the entire region, in essence, it was meant to end the 9 year-old conflict in Nicaragua. Unfortunately, for the people of Nicaragua, the Arias Peace Plan has thus far been a failure.

By signing this Peace Plan, Daniel Ortega committed the Sandinistas to working toward the democracy they had promised the people of Nicaragua nine years before. However, as was the case in 1979, it would seem that Ortega's true intention in signing the Arias Peace Plan on August 7, 1987, was to buy time in crushing all internal and external opposition rather than promoting the principles of democracy.

In March of this year, the Nicaraguan Democratic Resistance met with the Sandinistas face to face in Sapoa, Nicaragua. Resistance leaders were confident that they had reached an agreement with the Sandinistas that would finally mean "peace with freedom" for the Nicaraguan people. This was not to be the case.

Within two weeks of signing the Sapoa Agreement, the Sandinistas violated its terms. In exchange for a "definitive cease-fire," under which the Resistance would agree to lay down its arms, the Sandinistas promised, (1) an internal dialogue in which members of the Resistance would be allowed to participate, (2) unrestricted freedom of the press, and (3) release of all political prisoners. Sapoa called on the Sandinistas to sign an agreement by April 6, establishing a resupply system and cease-fire zones which Resistance forces were to occupy during a 60-day truce.

Once the occupation was under way, the Sandinistas would have to follow through with the commitments made at Sapoa. This never happened because the Sandinistas reneged on signing the agreement establishing a viable resupply system for the Resistance forces. Since that time, the Sandinista regime has disavowed itself from any agreements involving democratization and Sapoa, while at the same time using the cease-fire to their advantage.

While Nicaraguan Resistance troops are forced to become refugees in Honduras, the Sandinistas have been working aggressively to wipe out all forms of opposition within Nicaragua. For some reason, liberal democrats in the U.S. Congress have stood by and watched as the Sandinistas increase their oppression in Nicaragua, thus leaving the situation more desperate than before the Arias Peace Plan's introduction. Because the House Democratic leadership has remained faithful to Sandinista promises of democratization, the Nicaraguan Resistance is being stripped of its ability to remain a viable opposing force to the Sandinistas. This is a dangerous development for both the people of Central America and the United States.

It is now clear that the Sandinistas have no intention of working within the framework of either the Arias Peace Plan or the Sapoa Agreement. The future of Nicaragua has never been more bleak. The hope that the Arias Peace Plan originally inspired within the people of Nicaragua has turned into a nightmare. To continually ignore Sandinista insincerity toward peace can only make things worse for those who must live their daily lives under this tyrannical regime. It is time to hold the Sandinistas accountable.

ON THE DEMOCRATIC FRONT

DEAR FRIENDS: For almost eight years thousands of brave men, women and children have been sacrificing their lives in order to secure a long-desired free and democratic Nicaragua. Like those freedom fighters of the American Revolution who fought and died so that future generations of Americans could live in a pluralistic society where the rights of the individual come first, so do these dedicated Nicaraguans desire to benefit from the fruits of democracy.

When given the opportunity, the Nicaraguan Resistance was able to perform surprisingly well against a military force receiving over $40 million a month in Soviet military aid. Now, because certain members of Congress decided to place their trust in Daniel Ortega, the Resistance is no longer seen as a viable threat to the Sandinistas.

Unfortunately, the new Republican administration is faced with a dilemma that goes beyond whether the Resistance remains a capable opposition. The problem now centers around whether the next administration is going to allow the intense human suffering and the increased threat to neighboring democracies (including the United States) that has resulted from nine years of communist rule.

Already we see the negative results of a policy that has left the Nicaraguan Resistance without U.S. military aid. The Sandinistas have increased internal repression and have been able to focus their attention on the Communist insurgents in El Salvador known as the FMLN. The rise in FMLN guerilla activity throughout El Salvador can be directly attributed to Sandinista assistance.

Another problem facing the new administration is the increasing flow of refugees into the United States (400 per week) because of persecution and the tragic state of the communist Nicaraguan economy. To quote Dr. Albert Saborio, president of the Nicaraguan Bar Association, "Six months ago the belief that Nicaragua could change was sustaining the people, but now they've lost all hope. Nicaragua is going to remain in the Soviet camp, and the people are looking for an escape."

The Nicaraguan Resistance does not want war, we want peace and freedom. One only has to look at the Sapoa Accords to understand this fact. And, as the United States has learned in dealing with the Soviet Union, peace is better served through strength. I am of the opinion that the same applies to Soviet client states.

With the help of President Reagan and President-elect Bush, the Democratic Resistance was able to come close in achieving its ultimate goal of freeing the people of Nicaraguan from the tyrannical grip of the communists. For this assistance I sincerely thank both of them. However, the battle is far from over despite what has been written in the American media. Our struggle for freedom will continue for as long as it takes to rid Nicaragua of the despotic Sandinistas.

Abraham Lincoln once said, "Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God cannot long retain it." The Nicaraguan Resistance believes this to be true, and as long as these ideals remain alive in the hearts and minds of the Nicaraguan people, the commitment will remain alive in us as well.

Sincerely,

ADOLFO CALERO.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE AMERICAN CONSERVATION CORPS ACT OF 1989

HON. PAT WILLIAMS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the American Conservation Corps Act of 1989.

I have taken the bill introduced in prior years by Chairmen UDALL and SEIBERLING and more recently by Senator MOYNIHAN as S. 232, and strengthened the worker provisions relating to displacement as well as the education and training provisions of this act.

I look forward to working with my other colleagues in the House, especially Representative UDALL, PANETTA, and MARTINEZ who have chosen to combine this bill with other national service opportunities to develop the best bill possible on this issue.

A CELEBRATION OF YOUTH ESSAY CONTEST—"HOW CAN I MAKE THE WORLD A BETTER PLACE IN WHICH TO LIVE"

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to rise in this noble Chamber and salute the accomplishments of the winners of "A Celebration of Youth" essay contest.

These budding young writers accepted with zeal the challenge to explore and examine how the theme applied to everyday life as well as their life dreams.

Ten-year-old Joy Owens, a fifth grader at Garfield Elementary School, won first place in the elementary division. Joy lives with her mother and grandparents, and loves to read and save money. She plans to become a pediatrician.

Joy wrote:

I look at the world around me and sometimes I feel sad because of the things I see. It won't be long before my generation will be in charge of the world. We will be making major decisions which will effect us and others. From the way things look today, that's really a scary thought since I see kids my age using drugs, not respecting, nor caring about what they are doing. They seem to have lost hope. This has got to change. Michael Jackson says that we should start with ourselves and I believe that I can make the world a better place by starting with me.

Joy's teachers are Mrs. Carolyn Brown and Mrs. Saralee Bennett. The school's principal is Mr. William M.R. Pitts.

Rebekah Phillips, an 11-year-old sixth grader who attends Raymond Elementary School, won second place in this division. Rebekah is described as "sweet and caring." She likes to write and has written many short stories.

Rebekah wrote:

"I Can Make the World a Better Place in Which to Live" by trying to stop my family and friends from being prejudice[d]. So let's try to be nice in almost any mood you're in. Open up to a person that may not be your color—or if they ask you a question or need a friend. Let's all fight prejudice and make the world a better place in which to live.

Rebekah's teacher is Mrs. Gloria Younger. Ms. Deborah Nesmith is the principal.

Arthur Cheoley, a 12-year-old sixth grader at Draper Elementary School won third place in the elementary division. Arthur likes buses, airplanes and helicopters and enjoys participating in school plays and special programs.

Arthur wrote:

As a sixth grader, I can take time with small children, listen to what they say, and teach them new things. I have a younger brother who mimics my every move so it is very important for me to set a good example.

There is something that each of us can do. If we all do some of the little things, we will be surprised at what a big difference we can make.

Mrs. Cora Kirby is Arthur's teacher and Mr. Edward Stewart is the principal.

Jennifer Valentine, a ninth grader from Eliot Junior High School won first place in the junior high division. Jennifer is a member of the band, the Junior Honor Society and on the senior class committee.

Jennifer wrote:

The most important thing that I can do to make this world a better place in which to live is to make sure that I do not commit any acts which will bring disgrace to myself, my family or anyone with whom I associate. Another thing that I can do is to secure my future by getting my education now. If I do my very best now, then most likely my future will be a productive one.

Jennifer's teacher is Ms. Sharon Graham and Dr. Rosella Bardley is the principal.

Janine Francis, a student from Woodson Junior High School won second place in this division. Janine has won several writing contests and enjoys tennis and gymnastics. She is a member of the academ ic club, the beta club and the school band.

Janine wrote:

As a beginning, I practice discipline in my home where I live with my mother and younger sister. We show respect for each other in the home. Both my grandparents and parents disciplined me in the way they were taught. They have taught me that charity begins at home. I try to respect others and make a good impression on people in hopes that respect will spread from my actions.

Mrs. Bethena Best is Janine's teacher and the principal is Mr. James C. Greene.

Malion A. Bartley, a student at Jefferson Junior High School won third place in this division. Malion enjoys public reading, reading, and soccer. He is a member of the student government and the Junior Honor Society.

Malion wrote:

I Can Make the World a Better Place in Which to Live by spreading one word that is a necessity to me and for everyone in this great world. This one word is faith. If we have faith in ourselves now, we could do something in order to make the world a better place in which to live.

Ms. Rachel Hicks is Malion's teacher and the principal is Mrs. Vera M. White.

This annual writing competition is sponsored by A Celebration of Youth under the leadership of Mrs. Dodie Brady and Ms. Charlotte Travieso. Their vision and commitment is to "assist in bringing greater self-esteem, confidence, and a sense of positive purpose to people in all walks of life".

Today because of A Celebration of Youth, we are privileged to witness the raw material of human possibility. Tomorrow, far beyond any expectation, these seeds of potential will bear a mighty fruit.

ACCESS TO BASE CLOSURE COMMISSION PAPERS IS EASIER SAID THAN DONE

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, the Base Closure Commission Cochairmen, Messrs. Ribicoff and Edwards, have testified publicly before the House Armed Services Committee Subcommittee on Military Installations and Facilities and the Appropriations Committee Military Construction Subcommittee. In their remarks, these gentlemen have repeatedly stated that there is nothing secret in the Commission's papers and that everyone, including members of the press, should have access to them.

"Come on down" is the invitation. The papers are available in a reading room located just to the right of the elevator. It all sounds so simple. What is not mentioned is that a security clearance from the Office of the Secretary of Defense is required.

A member of my staff has applied for this temporary, interim, one-time-only security clearance for the sole purpose of viewing the Base Closure Commission's papers. In fact, the OSD processing officer has advised that my staff member was the very first applicant for this limited security clearance. The application paperwork and fingerprinting were completed on February 27. On February 28, this information was sent by messenger to the Pentagon. There is still no word as to when this clearance will be available.

I would like my staff to be able to accept the Commission Cochairmen's invitation to "come on down." However, this is impossible because the required security clearance application remains unprocessed.

Mr. Speaker, this is just one more example of the enormous difficulty encountered by this Member in attempting to obtain basic information regarding the Commission's recommendation that Chanute Air Force Base be closed. The economic impact of this proposed closure on my constituents is devastating. Yet, I cannot obtain very basic information regarding the economic justifications and rationale for the Commission's recommendation.

Mr. Speaker, I have been forced to file freedom-of-information requests with both the Base Closure Commission and the Department of the Air Force. I do not believe any Member of the House of Representatives should be treated in the manner that I have been. What is happening here strikes at the very heart and strength of this institution, and I want to bring this very serious matter to the attention of my fellow Members.

PROTECT STRIKING WORKERS FROM BEING PERMANENTLY REPLACED

HON. JOSEPH E. BRENNAN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to prohibit companies from hiring permanent replacement workers during the first 10 weeks of a strike. Like H.R. 4552, the measure I introduced during the last Congress, this legislation amends the National Labor Relations Act to provide limited protection to men and women who withhold their services as part of a labor dispute.

As you may know, a fundamental inconsistency exists in our present labor laws: workers are guaranteed the right to strike, but not protected from being permanently replaced. Under present law, a company can offer an outrageously unacceptable contract, effectively incite a strike, and then immediately replace striking workers with new, permanent employees.

The political and economic climate of the 1980's has encouraged a new aggressiveness on the part of management to exploit this loophole in our Nation's labor laws. During the last several years in my State of Maine, striking workers have, in two prominent instances, been permanently replaced within days of the beginning of a work stoppage.

In my mind, the permanent replacement of striking workers is not indicative of good-faith bargaining. Moreover, it makes a mockery of the spirit of the collective bargaining process. I ask you, where is management's incentive to negotiate if workers can, in effect, be fired for exercising their right to strike?

My legislation is a modest measure. It essentially establishes a 10-week protected period in which both management and labor have an opportunity to review their positions. While it protects striking workers from permanent replacement, it does not prohibit a company from using management or temporary personnel to continue operations.

I believe that working men and women deserve the benefit of a level playing field when they negotiate issues which directly impact their health, safety, and welfare. And, we in the Congress have an obligation to preserve that process which gives workers a voice in their future. I urge my colleagues to join me in restoring a measure of balance to the collective bargaining process.

NATIONAL STUDENT-ATHLETE DAY

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to designate April 6, 1989 as "National Student-Athlete Day." I believe the time has come to draw attention to student athletes and attempt to bring into balance academics and sports.

Unfortunately, we have let the imbalance between sports and academics go on for too long. It's time to gain a proper perspective on our priorities. When we sacrifice our educational principles on the altar of competitive sports, we do more than ruin the life of a young man or woman. We send a signal to all young people that thinking skills are less important than athletic skills. And in today's competitive world marketplace, that is not the message the United States should be sending. The commemoration of this day will demonstrate the House's support of a proper balance between athletics and education.

Last year, 44 States proclaimed April 6 as Student-Athlete Day; 10 States have already issued proclamations for 1989. A broad observance of National Student-Athlete Day will help educators promote the role of sports within education and emphasize the need for a balance between school and sports. Special programs are being planned in some States for the day that include professional athletes, who have returned to college to complete their degree, speaking to students about the importance of an education.

I ask that my colleagues support this measure and promote the spirit of this bill to their young constituents.

INTRODUCTION OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1989

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, today, the Education and Labor Committee ordered reported H.R. 2, a bill to increase the current minimum wage of $3.35 an hour to $4.65 an hour.

During the committee markup, I offered a compromise proposal which would increase the minimum wage from $3.35 an hour to $4.25 an hour. This compromise was defeated.

Several of my colleagues and I are today introducing this compromise so that the general membership of the House will know that there is a minimum wage proposal that will not result in the loss of 650,000 jobs as H.R. 2 would.

Specifically, the bill would increase the minimum wage to $4.25 an hour over a 3-year period—that is, from $3.35 to $3.65 the first year, to $3.95 the second year, and to $4.25 the third year. Just as in H.R. 2, the tip credit would be increased to 50 percent, and the small employer exemption would be increased to $500,000, except that the bill would not limit that exemption only to retail and service establishments. In addition, the bill contains a provision affecting newly hired workers: Employers would be permitted to pay newly hired workers 80 percent of the minimum wage or $3.35 whichever is higher, for up to 6 months. Displacement of workers would be prohibited.

The goal of this compromise bill is to increase the minimum wage, while minimizing the job loss that would result in an increase in the minimum wage. The Labor Department has estimated that the $4.65 wage rate proposed in H.R. 2 would result in the loss of 650,000 jobs. The $4.25 wage rate proposed in my bill would result in the loss of fewer jobs, that is 450,000 jobs. The new hire wage would save 170,000 jobs, and the tip credit and small employer expansions would save about 60,000 jobs. Increasing the minimum wage to $4.65—as in H.R. 2—instead of to $4.25—as in my bill— would cause the loss of an additional 200,000 jobs. The job loss numbers alone could be the subject of great debate. I know that the estimates range from the very low to the very high, yet the Labor Department believes that its estimate is in the middle of the range.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bipartisan bill we are introducing today. The bill represents a 27-percent increase in the minimum wage and has the support of the administration. It is my hipe to offer this as a substitute amendment to H.R. 2 during floor debate and urge my colleagues to support that amendment. I also urge my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation.

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS R. DEYULIA

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable lamentation that I announce, for the benefit of my colleauges who know him, the departure of Thomas R. DeYulia as staff director of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, which I have the honor of chairing.

Since 1983 Tom has served the committee with distinction and keen political insight. Through a very difficult period he has kept the committee on an even keel, while serving both the Congress and the people in a truly exemplary manner.

Tom has retired to become vice president for program and support services for CNA, one of the Nation's leading insurance organizations. And while I am indeed sorry to see him leave, I am pleased that he has earned such an enviable position in the private sector. I wish him well and know that he will take to the insurance industry the same kind of integrity and devotion that has been his hallmark as a key congressional staff person.

Tom began his congressional career in 1964 with our former colleague, James Hanley, of Syracuse, NY, my immediate predecessor as chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. He became staff director of the Subcommittee on Investigations of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in 1979, and staff director of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits in 1981, where he remained until he became staff director of the full committee in 1983.

He has been an invaluable member of that staff during a critical period, including the development of the new Federal employees' retirement system [FERS], and he played a major role in developing that imaginative program. He was, in fact, the key staff architect of FERS.

Those of you who know him, and many of you do, are aware of his keen ability to anticipate political problems and devise early solutions to them. I am certain, as well, that many of you have benefited from his shrewd ability to coordinate the building of coalitions so important to the legislative process.

From the time he took over a committee staff director, I have been impressed with his dedication to protecting the pay and benefits of Federal employees. He well understood that our Federal Government is losing its best and brightest people because pay and benefits have fallen behind.

Tom DeYulia is truly a professional who has demonstrated a dedication to service and integrity. We are going to miss him and his remarkable political judgment.

TRIBUTE TO PETE GABRIEL

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, St. Patrick's Day is a time to celebrate, a time to rejoice, and certainly a time to be thankful. It is also a time to contemplate, reflect upon, and honor those in the past who have given so freely of their time in hopes of keeping St. Patrick's Day the special occasion that it is. Mr. Pete Gabriel, who resides in my 17th District of Ohio, is deserving of this recognition.

Pete is the founder of the Pete Gabriel's St. Patrick's Day Parade. This year will mark the 11th consecutive year that this magnificent parade will have moved up and down the streets of our community. And, I speak on behalf of my district when I say that we are all looking forward to it.

Peter is a very highly talented, skilled, and regarded radio announcer for WKBN. He became interested in radio announcing when he applied for a part-time job at the base air station while serving in the Azores as an air policeman. After being honorably discharged, he decided to start a career as a civilian radio announcer at WMLP in Milton, Pa. In 1965, Pete became the public service director and the production supervisor of WPEC in Harrisburg, PA, in addition to being a radio announcer for that station. Also, in 1967 Pete was the winner of the Maclean's toothpaste national disc jockey contest for the best locally written and produced commercial.

Pete Gabriel has been happily married for 27 years to Sandy McCormick. They have three children—Wynne 25, David 22, and Lori 16, all of whom have provided a tremendous amount of love and support throughout the years.

At every step, Pete Gabriel has left behind a legacy of excellence and accomplishment. He is a great man who has given and continues to give much to the community. And, while I am standing here today, I would like to give Pete Gabriel something in return. I would like to give him my sincerest thank you, my deepest congratulations, and my best wishes for the future.

TRIBUTE TO JOE ED CARTER

HON. JOHN S. TANNER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. TANNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize Mr. Joe Ed Carter, a lifelong resident of the Eighth District of Tennessee. What makes Mr. Carter such a special resident of Tennessee is the fact that he celebrated his 106th birthday on March 10.

Mr. Carter lives in the community of Wynnburg, TN, in Lake County. He remains an active participant in the community and works regularly in his garden.

There is no question that attaining such a milestone in age is an achievement that holds lessons for us all. Throughout his life, Mr. Carter has been a patriotic, hard working American. He has devoted himself to his family, his community, and his State.

He has been rewarded with a long and productive life of which all of us should take special note. I want to take this opportunity to express my personal congratulations to Mr. Carter on the occasion of his 106th birthday.

HONORING THE ROCKWALL ROTARY CLUB

HON. RALPH M. HALL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on March 15, the Rockwall Rotary Club in Rockwall, TX, will celebrate its 50th anniversary.

I wish to commend this club on their 50 years of service and dedication to the Rockwall community.

Their motto "Service Above Self" is evident in the club's active participation in Rotary International's Polio Plus Program to eradicate polio in developing countries and regions worldwide. Each Rotary Club determines its own service activities which benefit youth, the disabled, the elderly and various other segments of the community. Among its numerous endeavors, the Rockwall Rotary Club chooses to sponsor one of the largest 4-year scholarships for a high school senior each year in the Rockwall Independent School District.

Since its charter in 1939, the club has grown to over 60 members, counting among them many of the community's leaders—and is one of the few clubs to own its own building. As one of its 50th anniversary projects, the Rockwall Rotary Club sponsored the creation of the Rockwall Rotary Breakfast Club will receive its charter on March 15, 1989, 50 years from the day the original club was chartered.

The Rockwall Rotary Club is one of over 23,000 Rotary Clubs located in 160 countries worldwide and has more than 1 million professional men and women as members.

The 49 men who have served as President during the club's 50 years are: Forest Stephenson, Foy Thomas, James A. Wilkerson, Tom Rush, Melvin Shook, Edgar L. Edwards, Fred B. Hamilton, J.O. Wallace, Jack Cunningham, James L. Glenn, Jess Whittle, Robert F. Polk, Martin D. Wimpee, Henry Zollner, Ralph M. Hall, Oliver Nevil, Frank Clark, Raymond B. Cameron, Ollie E. Steger, Leon Smith, Lloyd Hairston, R.G. Hagood, M.L. Jones, James D. Kelly, Forest Stephenson, Fobert May, Bill R. Cameron, Galen Williams, Art W. Wier, Donald Stodghill, Frank A. Robertson, Gerald Burgamy, Ted Cain, Richard Harris, Davis H. Canup, Jerry Lockart, Mickey Florence, Walter Zimmerman, Bruce Beaty, Gary Tarpley, Dennis Vierling, Blake Miles, Bob Cook, Art Kuhlman, Jack Horn, R.D. Vanderslice, Jimmy Williams, Kent Smith, and Ted Hosington.

Mr. Speaker, as the House of Representatives adjourns today, let's do so in honor of the Rockwall Rotary Club, its officers, and its many members who do truly put service above self.

HONORING ROBERT V. LIGGETT

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor Robert V. Liggett on his retirement after 42 years as a newspaperman. For 21 of those years Bob served as the managing editor of the Imperial Valley Press and The Brawley News. On March 17, Bob will be roasted by his "good friends and esteemed colleagues," at the Barbara Worth Country Club in Holtville, CA. While they may not seem so friendly and collegial at the roast, I'd like to take time out to express my own appreciation for his service to the people of the Imperial Valley.

Bob Liggett began his career in the press, while he was attending Eastern Michigan University, as a general assignment reporter for the Ypsilanti Daily Press. After college, Bob worked for 18 years at the South Bend Tribune as copy editor, bureau chief, editor of the Indiana and Michigan editions, and assistant city editor.

As the past president of the South Bend Press Club, the El Centro Rotary Club, and the El Centro Chamber of Commerce, Bob Liggett has set himself apart by his service to the community. He has served as the chairman of the board of the Imperial Valley Division of the American heart Association and is currently their president. Bob has been the lay leader and president of the Methodist Men's group at the First United Methodist Church of El Centro, where he remains an active member.

Bob served the people of the Valley well during his tenure at the Imperial Valley Press. Over the years Bob and the I.V. Press have covered storms, earthquakes, water negotiations, agriculture issues, and the successes, and failures, of the Valley's political representatives. Bob has taken the paper from a relatively small operation, to a modern, vibrant, and strong daily publication.

I don't know what Bob has planned for his retirement. I suspect that he'll be able to spend much more time with his grandchildren and family. I wish him the best of luck, and join the citizens of Imperial County in thanking him for his many years of service.

HONORING DONALD R. DUNLAP ON HIS RETIREMENT

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Mr. Donald R. Dunlap who, after completing 45 years of service to the United States of America, is retiring. Mr. Dunlap has exemplified the ideals of commitment and dedication throughout his 45 years in service to his country.

Mr. Dunlap's dedication to the United States is exhibited by the positions he has held. He began his 45-year career by entering the U.S. Air Force, at age 17. He spent many arduous hours of training in PA-18's, T-6's, T-28's, and T-23's. He graduated from the Air Force flight school and went on to fly B-25's, T-29's and finally, B-47's. His enthusiasm and skill toward his work enabled him to become a combat crew member for the Strategic Air Command where he spent the next 8 years serving as an aircraft commander. Logging over 5,000 hours of flight time, he still managed to hold several staff positions.

After 21 years of military service he never considered retiring, choosing to continue working as a civilian. Immediately following his Air Force career, he started at the Department of Defense as a civilian training director for the eastern region communication headquarters in Chicopee, MA.

Two and a half years later he began to work as an air traffic control specialist at Bradley International Airport in Windsor Locks, CT, until his transfer to Westfield, MA. Four years later, he became a supervisor and participated in the commissioning of a new control tower at Barnes Airport. Donald Dunlap has been a true asset to the community by helping young air traffic controllers succeed in their quest for obtaining demanding jobs at higher level facilities throughout the country. On many occasions during his career, Don was singled out for his excellent performances.

Mr. Speaker, Donald R. Dunlap is a remarkable man who will be greatly missed. There are thousands of individuals who have been extremely fortunate to receive the fruits of Don Dunlap's labor.

I salute Donald Dunlap. His accomplishments, spurred by his love and dedication for our country, are impressive. His absence will be a loss to all who have learned from him and benefited from his hard work and abundant energy. I wish him a long and happy retirement.

REPEAL TAX CODE'S SECTION 89

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, providing benefits to employees is a priority for many businesses. Public policy has supported these efforts by tax deductions and exemptions from income for many employee plans providing retirement income, disability, and death benefits, educational benefits, health benefits, and many other types of employee plans.

The Tax Reform Act of 1986 added section 89 to the Internal Revenue Code. This section requires that nondiscrimination tests be performed on all employee plans. These tests are designed to ensure that the plans are not discriminating against lower compensated employees. If the test finds that discrimination does exist then highly compensated employees are required to include in their gross income the amount of the excess benefit provided by the plan.

I have not found anyone who advocates discriminatory employee plans, but the test that has been proposed by the Internal Revenue Service is highly complex and far beyond the ability of many employers to perform. The complexity is shown by the delay that the IRS had in issuing the regulation. Many employee benefit counsels and consultants have taken the position of advocating that the tax is far cheaper to pay than the expense of the test.

I have talked with and heard from many business men and women in my district, and they have indicated that the tests mandated by the IRS are far too complex. The section should be repealed and other approaches considered to ensure that no discrimination exists in any employee plan. I am an original cosponsor of H.R. 634, which would repeal this section.

The ability of American business to effectively and properly provide for the welfare and interests of its employees should not be impaired by the Federal Government. The Government does have an interest in ensuring that if a benefit is provided by an employer, that the benefit be equally available to all employees. But the methods employed in making that determination must not be so onerous as to make the benefit meaningless.

That's why, Mr. Speaker, this Congress should move to repeal section 89.

THE GREENSBORO YMCA

HON. HOWARD COBLE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. COBLE. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, March 20, 1989, a time capsule will be buried in Greensboro, NC. There will be all types of items placed within the time capsule to note of the people, places, and things that make up our world today. The purpose of the time capsule is to commemorate 100 years of service by the Greensboro Young Men's Christian Association, or as it is commonly known, the YMCA.

For a century, the YMCA has been serving our community. For 100 years, the Greensboro YMCA has been a place where people could gather to learn, to play, and to grow. For 100 years, the YMCA has served men and women of all ages. We pause to reflect on the first 100 years of service to our community, and we look forward to the next 100 years. Sometime in the future, when this time capsule is opened, the people who will look at its contents will know we valued the service that the Greensboro YMCA has provided.

The Greensboro YMCA has several branches around our city to provide quality recreational and community services to all segments of our area. We are fortunate to have dedicated staff members and volunteers to operate the various branches. We salute all of those involved in helping the Greensboro YMCA celebrate 100 years of service. Without the dedication of many people, these past 100 years would not have been possible.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud to say that for 100 years the Greensboro YMCA has been there when we needed it. On behalf of the people of the Sixth District of North Carolina, I wish to extend best wishes for the next 100 years.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 24

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to introduce today legislation designating the week of May 1-7, 1989 "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week." A companion measure, Senate Joint Resolution 24, has already been introduced by my distinguished colleague, Senator DENNIS DECONCINI of Arizona. This measure was enacted the past 2 years and I urge my House colleagues again to support it.

Each year, an estimated 1.1 million older Americans are the victims of physical, financial, and psychological abuse, neglect and the denial of their fundamental civil rights. Since the first landmark report issued on elder abuse in 1981 by the Select Committee on Aging, the number of cases has dramatically increased—by 100,000 abuse cases per year. With our growing elderly population, the figures are expected to soar even higher.

Regrettably, elder abuse occurs within every racial, religious, and socioeconomic group in America. It occurs in cities and rural areas, suburbs and small towns. Unfortunately, out of fear of retribution by their abuses, or for other reasons, only one of six elder abuse victims come forward to report incidents of abuse.

In many instances, elder abuse can be curbed simply by increasing information on appropriate intervention and prevention. Proclaiming this week, in the month traditionally designated "Older Americans Month," will go far toward educating and informing the American public. Therefore, I hope you Members of the House will join me in supporting this important measure.

INTRODUCTION OF NATIONAL INFERTILITY AWARENESS WEEK

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, 10 years ago, the world marveled at the birth of Louise Brown, the first "test tube" baby. In the past decade, the infertility industry has mushroomed; this year alone, an estimated $1 billion will be spent on treatments in the United States.

My subcommittee held two hearings to discuss the difficulties faced by infertile couples. At the first hearing, the subcommittee was repeatedly told by witnesses that infertile couples find it extremely difficult to obtain clear, understandable, and unbiased information about the performance of IVF clinics.

Many of these couples are desperate to have children. Some have been on an emotional roller-coaster for years, attempting to conceive through a variety of procedures. They are vulnerable to exploitation.

Nine physicians writing in the November 1987 issue of the American Fertility Society's news magazine described three major areas of infertility practice that are "highly susceptible to potential exploitation: Inappropriate use of credentials; misuse of new technologies; and truth in advertising."

The experts agree that these problems crop up because there is no official oversight of this growing field of medicine—either from private insurers or from the State and Federal governments.

Thankfully, the consumer education group Resolve, Inc. has taken on the responsibility of informing and educating couples about their rights and options available to them.

I am introducing National Infertility Awareness Week to call the public's attention to the problems these couples face. It is important to recognize that this new technology is a miracle for many and holds great promise. It is also important to recognize that information should be available to those who want to use these services, so that they can make informed choices.

I encourage my colleagues to join me by sponsoring National Infertility Awareness Week to improve the public's knowledge of this growing problem and the possibilities that exist for couples that suffer from infertility.

INTRODUCTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL SECURITIES ENFORCEMENT COOPERATION ACT OF 1989

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 14, 1989

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing, along with the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, Mr. DINGELL, and the ranking minority members of the committee and the Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance, Representatives LENT and RINALDO, the International Securities Enforcement Cooperation Act of 1989. The legislation is cosponsored by Representatives ECKART, SLATTERY, BOUCHER, COOPER, MANTON, WYDEN, RITTER, MADIGAN, WHITTAKER, BLILEY, BILIRAKIS, and MCMILLAN of North Carolina. Given this strong bipartisan backing for this proposal, I hope we can move forward on it very shortly.

This legislation, introduced upon request of the Securities and Exchange Commission, is a natural followup to the Insider Trading and Securities Fraud Enforcement Act of 1989, which I authored last year with Representatives DINGELL, LENT, and RINALDO. Given the inevitably increasing trend of globalization of our world's securities markets, we cannot effectively enforce our own securities laws without the maximum cooperation of other nations. The stunning stories of greed and corruption in Japan and France in recent months have highlighted the convergence of international opinion on the need for fair and honest financial markets.

The increasing internationalization of the world's securities markets is an unchallengeable fact of life. Advances in communications and computer technology permitting a 24-hour global trading market, links among exchanges and clearinghouses, and cross listings on and memberships in exchanges of several different nations have all greatly facilitated international financial interdependence, particularly in the equities markets.

The potential gains from globalization are enormous. The expanded opportunities for market participation mean a larger pool of investors, thus increasing liquidity in the capital markets. Issuers of securities gain by being able to place their issues more easily in the marketplace, underwriters gain through reduced risks of underwriting in a more liquid market, and investors gain by having a wider choice of assets in which to invest. All of this activity should theoretically expand the opportunities for business to make the vital capital investments necessary to expand production, innovate, and create jobs in the future.

While internationalization carries obvious benefits, it also carries clear risks. Although the linkage of markets has proceeded rapidly, the linkage of regulation has not followed suit nearly so swiftly. There is today no global regulatory agency to oversee the markets and assure harmonization of laws and regulations to protect market participants. Therefore, it is left to individual sovereign nations to coordinate their own laws and regulatory efforts to assure fairer as well as more efficient market operations.

The proposed legislation would do the following: Grant an exemption from the Freedom of Information Act for documents provided to the SEC by foreign government authorities; permit the Commission to sanction securities professionals based on violations of foreign securities laws; expand the authority of self-regulatory organizations to exclude convicted felons from membership based on violations of foreign laws; and authorize the SEC to accept reimbursement for expense incurred on behalf of foreign governmental authorities in their investigations.

Mr. Speaker, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance, I intend to move swiftly on this legislative proposal. There are many areas in the international marketplace in which competition is critical and we face tremendous challenges to compete effectively with other nations. But in the area of combating international securities fraud, the cornerstone must be not competition, but cooperation.

For the information of my colleagues, I am inserting into the RECORD at this point a section-by-section analysis of the legislation introduced today:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE LEGISLATION

Section 2: Section 2 of the Act amends Section 24 of the Exchange Act by adding new subsections authorizing the Commission to withhold from disclosure documents furnished to the Commission by foreign securities officials upon certain conditions.

Section 2(a): Section 2(a) is an amendment necessitated by the scheme of amended Section 24 of the Exchange Act, to which the Act adds several subsections. It strikes from Section 24(b) the sentence, "Nothing in this subsection shall authorize the Commission to withhold information from the Congress." That sentence becomes part of new Section 24(e) of the Exchange Act under Section 2(b) of the Act.

Section 2(b): Section 2(b) adds new subsections (c), (d), and (e) to Section 24 of the Exchange Act. New Section 24(c) clarifies the Commission's authority to provide records, as defined in Section 24(a) of the Exchange Act, in its discretion and upon a showing that the information is needed, to any persons deemed appropriate by the Commission by rule. The subsection conditions this discretionary authority on the person receiving the information assuring its confidentiality as the Commission deems appropriate. Section 2(b) of the Act also adds new Section 24(d) to the Exchange Act. Section 24(d) states that notwithstanding the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act or of any other law, the Commission shall not be compelled to disclose records obtained from a foreign securities authority, if the foreign authority has in good faith represented to the Commission that public disclosure of such records would be contrary to the laws applicable to that foreign securities authority. This amendment will allow the Commission to obtain otherwise unobtainable confidential documents from foreign countries for law enforcement purposes. New Section 24(e) clarifies that nothing in Section 24 authorizes the Commission to withhold information from Congress or not to comply with an order of a United States court in an action initiated by the United States or the Commission. It also clarifies that this section does not alter the Commission's responsibilities under the Right to Financial Privacy Act, 12 U.S.C. 3401 et seq., as limited by Section 21(h) of the Exchange Act, with respect to transfers of records covered by these statutes.

Section 3: Section 3 of the Act amends the Exchange Act to authorize the Commission to impose sanctions on brokers or dealers, their associated persons, and individuals seeking to become associated persons of brokers or dealers on the basis of misconduct in a foreign country.

Section 3(a): Section 3(a) of the Act amends Section 15(b) of the Exchange Act, the Exchange Act's registration provision. Subsection (a)(1) provides for Commission censure of, limitations on the activities of or revocation or suspension of the registration of brokers or dealers, based upon a conviction within ten years rendered by a foreign court of competent jurisdiction of a crime which is substantially equivalent to a felony or misdemeanor as provided by Section 15(b)(4)(B). The Act thus clarifies the Commission's authority to consider offenses from foreign jurisdictions that might not classify crimes formally as felonies or misdemeanors, e.g., non-common law jurisdictions.

Section 15(b)(4)(B)(i) lists offenses involving the purchase or sale of any security, the taking of a false oath, the making of a false report, bribery, perjury, burglary, or conspiracy to commit any such offense as within the class of felonies and misdemeanors that permit the Commission to sanction brokers or dealers. Subsection (a)(2) of the Act amends this provision by including within this list any substantially equivalent activity, however denominated by the laws of a foreign government. The Act therefore clarifies the Commission's authority consider such activities even if the foreign government does not denominate them as precisely the same, offenses that they constitute within the United States.

Section 15(b)(4)(B)(ii) also allows the Commission to consider offenses arising out of the conduct of various securities-related businesses, including the business of a broker, dealer, municipal securities dealer, government securities broker, government securities dealer, investment adviser, bank, insurance company, fiduciary, or transfer agent. Subsection (a)(3)(A) of the Act amends Section 15(b)(4)(B)(ii) by including any substantially equivalent activity, however denominated by the laws of a foreign government. The Act accordingly clarifies the commission's authority to consider such offenses regardless of the employment terms involved, which may differ in foreign countries. Section 15(b)(4)(B)(ii) also permits the Commission to consider offenses arising out of the conduct of the business of an entity or person required to be registered under the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 1 et seq.). Subsection (a)(3)(B), therefore, also amends Section 15(b)(4)(B)(ii) by including any equivalent foreign statute or regulation. The Act thus clarifies the Commission's authority to consider foreign offenses arising out of the commodities trading business.

Section 15(b)(4)(B)(iii) includes larceny, theft, robbery, extortion, forgery, counterfeiting, fraudulent concealment, embezzlement, fraudulent conversion, and misappropriation of funds or securities within the list of offenses that trigger Commission sanction. Subsection (a)(4) of the Act adds any substantially equivalent activity, however denominated by the laws of foreign government.

Section 15(b)(4)(B)(iv) of the Exchange Act includes violations of Sections 152, 1341, 1342, or 1343 or Chapter 25 or 47 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code within the list of offenses that the Commission may consider. These provisions concern concealment of assets, false oaths and claims, and bribery in connection with bankruptcy; mail fraud; wire fraud; counterfeiting and forgery; and fraud and false statements, respectively. Subsection (a)(5) amends Section 15(b)(4)(B) (iv) by including a violation of a substantially equivalent foreign statute.

Section 15(b)(4)(C) also empowers the Commission to impose sanctions on the basis of permanent or temporary injunctions against acting in the securities-related or commodities-related capacities enumerated in Section 15(b)(4)(B)(ii) and against engaging in or continuing any conduct or practice in connection with such activity or in connection with the purchase or sale of any security. Section (a)(6)(A) amends Section 15(b)(4)(C) by including foreign persons performing substantially equivalent functions, and subsection (a)(6)(C) includes substantially equivalent foreign entities. The Act thereby clarified the Commission's authority on this point in the same way and for the same reasons as subsection (a)(3)(A). Subsection (a)(6)(B) amends Section 15(b)(4)(C) by including any foreign statute or regulation substantially equivalent to the Commodity Exchange Act, thus clarifying the Commission's authority with the same basis and purpose as subsection (a)(3)(B).

Subsection (a)(7) adds new Section 15(b)(4)(G) to the exchange Act. Subparagraph (G) empowers the Commission to base sanctions on findings by a foreign securities authority of (1) false or misleading statements in registration or reporting materials filed with the foreign securities authority, (2) violations of statutory provisions concerning securities or commodities transactions, or (3) aiding, abetting, or otherwise causing another person's violation of such foreign securities or commodities provisions, or failing to supervise a person who has committed such a violation. Subparagraph (G) substantially parallels the provisions of existing Sections 15(b)(4)(A), (D), and (E) concerning such findings by the Commission or other securities and commodities regulatory authorities.

Section 3(b): Section 3(b) of the Act amends Section 3(a)(39) of the Exchange Act, which concerns statutory disqualification from self-regulatory organization ("SRO") membership. Under the present statutory and regulatory scheme, a person subject to statutory disqualification is not excluded automatically from the securities business. However, when such a person seeks to become associated with a member of an SRO, that SRO and the Commission have the opportunity, under Section 15A(g)(2) of the Exchange Act and Rule 19h-1 thereunder, to give special review to the person's employment application or to restrict or prevent reentry into the business where appropriate for the protection of investors. This structural use of statutory disqualification does not change with the Act's amendments. Rather, the amendments expand, by incorporation, the list of findings that result in statutory disqualification.

Section 3(b)(1) of the Act amends Section 3(a)(39)(A), which now lists expulsion or suspension from membership or participation in, or association with a member of, an SRO, commodity contract market, or futures association as resulting in statutory disqualification, to include exclusion in the described manner from the foreign equivalent of an SRO, foreign or international securities exchange, or a foreign contract market, board of trade, or futures association.

Similarly, Section 3(b)(2) amends Section 3(a)(39)(B) by expanding it. It currently refers to orders of the Commission or another appropriate regulatory agency suspending or revoking registration as a broker, dealer, municipal securities dealer, or government securities dealer or broker. The amendments to Section 3(a)(39) apply to brokers, dealers, municipal securities dealers, government securities brokers, and government securities dealers of any nationality, because these terms are defined in Exchange Act Sections 3(a)(4), 3(a)(5), 3(a)(30), 3(a)(43), and 3(a)(44) without reference to nationality. Under Section 3(b)(2), orders by an appropriate foreign financial regulatory authority denying, suspending, or revoking authority to engage in transactions in contracts of sale of a commodity for future delivery traded on or subject to the rules of a contract market, board of trade, or foreign equivalent also will result in statutory disqualification.

Section 3(b)(3) redesignates subparagraphs (D) and (E) of Section 3(a)(39) as subparagraphs (E) and (F), respectively. Section 3(b)(4) adds new subparagraph (D), which includes among the conditions that result in statutory disqualification findings by a foreign or international securities exchange, foreign securities authority, or other foreign authority empowered by a foreign government to administer or enforce its laws relating to financial transactions, to the effect that an individual, by his conduct, was a cause of a suspension, expulsion, or order by the foreign securities authority or other foreign financial regulator or administrator.

Sections 3(b)(5) and (6) of the Act make conforming amendments in newly redesignated subparagraphs (E) and (F) of Section 3(a)(39) of the Exchange Act, adding references to new Sections 3(a)(39)(D) and 15(b)(4)(G) of the Exchange Act, respectively. In addition, under the Act, subparagraph (F), which by cross reference to Section 15(b)(4) of the Exchange Act makes persons convicted of specified felonies and misdemeanors subject to statutory disqualification, adds "any other felony" to the list of crimes that warrant special review. This provision permits the Commission and the SROs to provide special scrutiny of persons who have been convicted of crimes that are not currently specified, such as taking of property, assault, murder, and drug trafficking. This amendment does not automatically exclude every person convicted of a felony from the securities business. Rather, it permits SROs, subject to Commission review, to consider the facts and circumstances surrounding a particular felony and to impose necessary safeguards to protect the markets and investors from unreasonable risks.

Section 3(c): Section 3(c) of the Act makes conforming amendments. It amends Section 15(b)(6) of the Exchange Act, which authorizes the Commission to censure, limit the activities of, or bar or suspend from association with a broker or dealer any person who has committed or omitted any act or omission enumerated in subparagraphs (A), (D), or (E), has been convicted of any offense enumerated in subparagraph (B), or has been enjoined as specified in subparagraph (C). By adding to Section 15(b)(6) findings by a foreign securities authority under new Subparagraph (G), Section 3(c) authorizes the Commission to consider such findings when imposing sanctions upon persons who are, or who seek to become, associated persons of a broker or dealer.

Section 3(c) similarly amends Sections 15B(c)(2), 15B(c)(4), 15C(1)(A), 15C(c)(1)(C), 17A(c)(3)(A), and 17A(c)(3)(C) of the Exchange Act by adding new subparagraph 15(B)(4)(G) as a basis for Commission action under those provisions.

Sections 15B(c) (2) and (4), which concern the Commission's disciplinary authority over municipal securities dealers and their associated persons, and which parallel Sections 15(b) (4) and (6), are amended to include a reference to new Section 15(b)(4)(G). Findings of misconduct by a foreign securities authority thus can support Commission sanctions against municipal securities dealers and their associated persons.

Sections 15C(c)(1) (A) and (C), which concern the Commission's sanctioning authority over government securities brokers and dealers and their associated persons, and which also parallel Sections 15(b) (4) and (6), are amended to include a reference to new Section 15(b)(4)(G), for the same reason as above.

Sections 17A(c)(3) (A) and (C), which concern the Commission's sanctioning authority over transfer agents and their associated persons, and which further parallel Sections 15(b) (4) and (6), are amended to include a reference to new Section 15(b)(4)(G) for the same reason.

Section 15C(f)(2) of the Exchange Act currently forbids the Commission from investigating or taking any other action under the Exchange Act against a government securities broker or dealer or its associated persons for violations of Section 15C or the rules or regulations thereunder. The exception is where the Commission, rather than one of the banking regulators (Comptroller of the Currency for national banks, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System for state member banks, Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation for insured nonmember state banks, and Federal Home Loan Bank Board for federally insured savings and loan associations), is the appropriate regulatory agency for the government securities broker or dealer. Section 15C(f)(2), by its own terms, also does not limit the Commission's authority with respect to violations of any other provisions of the Exchange Act or of corresponding rules or regulations. Section 6(c) of the At extends this exception by forbidding limitations on investigations pursuant to Section 21(a)(2) of the Exchange Act to assist a foreign securities authority.

Section 4: In order to ensure that orders of any regulatory body, foreign or domestic, with authority to suspend or revoke registration or its equivalent are available to the Commission, Section 4 of the Act adds a new definition of the term "foreign financial regulatory authority," as Section 3(a)(51) of the Exchange Act. A "foreign financial regulatory authority" is defined to include any foreign securities authority, which is defined in Section 3(a)(50) of the Exchange Act; governmental or regulatory bodies empowered to administer or enforce laws relating to enumerated financial matters; and membership organizations that regulate members' participation in financial matters. Pursuant to the Act's amendments to Section 3(a)(39) of the Exchange Act, orders of foreign financial regulatory authorities are deemed sufficient to result in "statutory disqualification," as will such an order limiting registration of the foreign equivalent of any of the enumerated entities.

Section 5: Section 5 of the Act makes parallel amendments to the Investment Company Act of 1940 ("1940 Act") and the Investment Advisers Act of 1940 ("Advisers Act") to clarify and strengthen the Commission's authority to impose sanctions, on the basis of violations of foreign law, or investment advisers or on persons associated or seeking to become associated with an investment adviser or a registered investment company.

Section 5(a): Section 5(a) of the Act amends Section 9(b) of the 1940 Act. Section 9(a) of the 1940 Act generally prohibits a person convicted of a felony or misdemeanor involving securities or the securities business or subject to a temporary or permanent injunction restricting his ability to engage in the securities business from serving as an employee, officer, director, member of an advisory board, investment adviser, or depositor of any registered investment company, or principal underwriter for any registered open-end company, unit investment trust, or face-amount certificate company. The automatic statutory disqualification in Section 9(a) is supplemented by the Commission's authority under Section 9(b). Under Section 9(b), the Commission may, after notice and opportunity for hearing, prohibit a person from serving in any of the capacities cited in Section 9(a) or as an affiliated person of a registered investment company's investment adviser, depositor, or principal underwriter if the person has willfully caused a false or misleading statement to be made in any registration statement, application, or report filed with the Commission or if the person has willfully violated or willfully aided and abetted a violation of any provision (including rules and regulations) of the federal securities laws or the Commodity Exchange Act.

In an amendment parallel to Sections 3(a)(7) and 5(b)(8) of the Act, Section 9(b) is amended to add a new paragraph (4) that will authorize the Commission to restrict the activities of any person that has been found by a foreign authority to have (1) made any false or misleading statement in an application or report filed with a foreign securities authority or in a proceeding before the foreign securities authority, or (2) violated or aided and abetted the violation of foreign securities or commodities statutes. Paragraph (4) will, therefore, parallel the provisions of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of Section 9(b), and extend the statute to equivalent foreign violations.

Section 9(b) also is amended to add two new provisions, Sections 9(b)(5) and 9(b)(6), that will allow the Commission by order to prohibit a person from serving in any of the designated capacities if the person has been convicted by a foreign court of any of the offenses designated in Section 9(a)(1) or has been enjoined by a foreign court in a manner set forth in Section 9(a)(2). Sections 9(a) (1) and (2) automatically disqualify anyone who within the past 10 years has been convicted of any felony or misdemeanor involving, or is subject to a permanent or temporary injunction relating to, acting as an underwriter, broker, dealer, investment adviser, municipal securities dealer, or entity or person required to be registered under the Commodity Exchange Act, or as an affiliated person, salesman, or employee of any investment company, bank, insurance company, or entity or person required to be registered under the Commodity Exchange Act, or in connection with the purchase or sale of any security. Although a conviction or injunction under Section 9(a) (1) or (2) results in an automatic statutory disqualification, a substantially equivalent foreign conviction or injunction would not. However, a substantially equivalent foreign finding will provide a basis for a Commission order prohibiting the individual's association with a registered investment company in any of the capacities designated in the statute. The automatic disqualification provisions of Section 9(a), coupled with the Commission's exemptive authority under Section 9(c) to avoid any inequitable results, are indispensable means of safeguarding the integrity of registered investment companies. The amended Section 9(b) does not automatically bar a person solely on the basis of a foreign finding of a violation of foreign law without any prior notice or opportunity for hearing by a U.S. court or administrative agency. Instead, amended Section 9(b) provides that the Commission may impose a bar on a case-by-case basis if it determines that the foreign finding justifies such a sanction. The amendment does not create competitive disparities because, just as Section 9(a) applies equally to U.S. and foreign persons that have been convicted or enjoined in a manner specified in the statute, Section 9(b), as amended, grants the Commission authority to institute an administrative proceeding against either a U.S. or foreign person that has committed an equivalent foreign violation and has been sanctioned by a foreign authority.

Section 5(b): Section 5(b) of the Act amends Section 203(e) of the Advisers Act. Section 203(e) authorizes the Commission to censure, place limitations on the activities of, suspend for up to twelve months, or revoke the registration of an investment adviser where the adviser or an associated person of the adviser has committed, or has been sanctioned for, certain specified violations. Section 5(b) of the Act amends Section 203(e) to include, among the factors that the Commission may consider, violations of foreign law that are substantially equivalent to a violation currently set forth in the statute.

Subsection 203(e)(2) of the Advisers Act authorizes the Commission to consider convictions within the past ten years of certain felonies and misdemeanors. Section 5(b)(1) of the Act amends this section to include convictions by a foreign court of competent jurisdiction of crimes substantially equivalent to a felony or misdemeanor. The Act thus clarifies the Commission's authority to consider foreign criminal findings that the foreign jurisdiction may not classify as a "felony" or "misdemeanor."

Section 203(e)(2)(A) of the Advisers Act lists offenses involving the purchase or sale of any security, the taking of a false oath, the making of a false report, bribery, perjury, burglary, or conspiracy to commit any such offense as within the class of felonies and misdemeanors that authorize the Commission to discipline investment advisers. Section 5(b)(2) of the Act amends Section 203(e)(2)(A) by including within this list any substantially equivalent activity, however denominated by the laws of a foreign government.

Section 203(e)(2)(B) of the Advisers Act authorizes the Commission to consider offenses arising out of the conduct of various securities-related businesses. Included is any broker, dealer, municipal securities dealer, government securities broker, government securities dealer, investment adviser, bank, insurance company, fiduciary, transfer agent, or entity or person required to be registered under the Commodity Exchange Act. Subsection 5(b)(3) of the Act amends Sections 203(e)(2)(B) and (e)(3) to include offenses arising out of the conduct of any foreign person performing a function substantially equivalent to any of the above.

Section 203(e)(2)(C) of the Advisers Act includes larceny, theft, robbery, extortion, forgery, counterfeiting, fraudulent concealment, embezzlement, fraudulent conversion, and misappropriation of funds or securities within the list of offenses that my trigger Commission sanctions. Section 5(b)(4) of the Act adds any substantially equivalent offense, however denominated by the laws of a foreign government.

Section 203(e)(2)(D) of the Advisers Act includes violations of Sections 152, 1341, 1342, or 1343 or Chapter 25 or 47 of title 18 of the U.S. Code within the list of offenses that the Commission may consider. These provisions concern concealment of assets, false oaths and claims, and bribery in connection with bankruptcy; mail fraud; wire fraud; counterfeiting and forgery; and fraud and false statements, respectively. Section 5(b)(5) of the Act amends Section 203(e)(2)(D) to include a violation of a substantially equivalent foreign statute.

Section 203(e)(3) of the Advisers Act authorizes the Commission to impose sanctions where an investment adviser or associated person has been enjoined from acting as an investment adviser, underwriter, broker, dealer, municipal securities dealer, government securities broker, government securities dealer, or entity or person required to be registered under the Commodity Exchange Act, or as an affiliated person or employee of any investment company, bank or insurance company or entity or person required to be registered under the Commodity Exchange Act, or from engaging in any practice in connection with any of these activities or in connection with the purchase or sale of any security. Sections 5(b)(3) and 5(b)(6) of the Act amend Advisers Act Section 203(e)(3) to include injunctions issued by any foreign court of competent jurisdiction that concern substantially equivalent activities.

Section 5(b)(7) of the Act is a technical amendment to Section 203(e)(5) of the Advisers Act. Section 203(e)(5) is amended to include violations of the Commodity Exchange Act. This technical amendment conforms Section 203(e)(5) with Section 203(e)(4) of the Advisers Act and Sections 15(b)(4)(D) and 15(b)(4)(E) of the Exchange Act.

Section 5(b)(8) of the Act adds new Section 203(e)(7) to the Advisers Act. This new subsection empowers the Commission to base sanctions on findings by a foreign financial regulatory authority of (1) false or misleading statements in registration or reporting materials filed with a foreign securities authority, (2) violations of statutory provisions concerning securities or commodities transactions, or (3) aiding, abetting, or otherwise causing another person's violation of such foreign securities or commodities provisions, or failing to supervise a person who has committed such a violation. Subsection (e)(7) substantially parallels the provisions of existing Section 203(e)(1), (4) and (5) concerning such findings by the Commission or other securities and commodities regulatory authorities. This section of the Act parallels Sections 3(a)(7) and 5(a) of the Act, which add Subsection 15(b)(4)(7) of the Exchange Act and Section 9(b)(4) of the 1940 Act.

Section 5(c): Section 5(c) of the Act amends Section 203(f) of the Advisers Act, which authorizes the Commission to impose sanctions upon persons associated or seeking to become associated with an investment adviser if the persons has committed or omitted any act or omission set forth in Sections 203(e)(1), (4) or (5) or has been convicted or enjoined as set forth in Sections 203(e)(2) or 203(e)(3). Section 203(f) is amended to include a reference to new Section 203(e)(7), thus authorizing the Commission to consider such findings when imposing sanctions upon persons who are, or seek to become, associated with an investment adviser.

Section 6: Section 6 amends Section 2(a) of the 1940 Act and Section 202(a) of the Advisers Act to include definitions of "foreign securities authority" and "foreign financial regulatory authority". These definitions are identical to the definitions of foreign securities authority in Section 21(a)(2) of the Exchange Act and the definition of foreign financial regulatory authority added by Section 4 of the Act.

Section 7: Section 7 adds a new subsection (f) to Section 4 of the Exchange Act to authorize the Commission to accept reimbursement of expenses from or on behalf of foreign securities authorities for expenses incurred by the Commission in conducting investigations on their behalf or in providing other assistance. This new subsection is similar to subsection (c) of the section, which authorizes the Commission to accept reimbursement from private sources for the expenses incurred by Commission members and employees in attending meetings and conferences concerning the functions or activities of the Commission.
